10. PLATO, the Grecian, taught thus: "The unrighteous man, or the sayer and doer of unholy things, had far better not yield to the illusion that his roguery is cleverness." "For men glory in their shame; they fancy they hear others say of them, 'these are not mere good-for-nothing persons, burdens on the earth, but such as men should be who mean to dwell safely in a State.'" "There are two patterns set before them in nature; the one blessed and divine, the other godless and wretched." "Honor is a divine good, and no evil thing is honorable." "The perfectly just man is he who loves justice for its own sake; not for the honors and advantages that attend, and is willing to pass for unjust while he practices the most exact justice, and will not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but will continue steadfast in the love of justice, not because it is pleasant, but because it is right."

11. SEXTUS, over 400 years B. C., taught thus: "What you wish your neighbors to be to you, such be ye also to them." "Endure all things, if you would serve God."

12. ARISTOTLE, 380 years B. C., thus taught: "We should conduct ourselves toward others as we would have them act towards us."

13. ARISTIPPUS, 365 years B. C., taught thus: "Cherish that reciprocal benevolence which will make you as anxious for another's welfare as for your own."

14. ISOCRATES, 338 years B. C., said: "Act toward others as you would have them act towards you."

15. PUBLIUS SYRUS said: "Pardon the offences of others, but never your own." "You can accomplish by kindness what you cannot by force." "Better overlook an injury than avenge it." "It is a kingly spirit to return good deeds for evil ones." "Receive an injury rather than do one."

16. THE ESSENES enjoined: "Lay up nothing on earth, but fix your mind solely on heaven." "For-sake father, mother, brothers and sisters, houses and lands."

17. HILLEL, 50 years B. C., inculcated: "Do not to others, what you would not like others to do to you."

18. ANTONIUS said: "Be to every one kind and friendly."

19. PHILO taught: "It is our first duty to seek the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness."

20. MARCUS AURELIUS, a Roman Emperor of the second century, but who was a heathen, said: "Be cheerful and seek not external help, nor the tranquillity which others give." "A man must stand erect, and not be kept erect by others." "Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to desire anything which needs walls and curtains." "If thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to nature, with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy, and there is no man able to prevent this."

Similar maxims of morality and exalted sentiments from the sages and teachers who lived and died prior to the Christian era, might easily be quoted to the extent of a large volume, but this is not our present purpose. We have, however, cited enough, together with what we have given our readers in previous articles, to show that morals as pure and unexceptionable were uttered by numerous teachers, as Jesus is said to have promulgated. According to Jesus all the praise that may be due him for many of his utterances, candor and truth compels the avowal that his best sayings were not original with him, or if they were, that he was far from being the first to present them to the world.

We see in the above extracts as much to commend and revere as in the teachings of the Nazarene, and less that is objectionable. As much as may be said by the admirers of Jesus in favor of his inculcations, he certainly taught some doctrines that would, if carried out, not tend to the benefit of the world. For instance, his charge to "take no thought for the morrow," would prevent enterprise, provision for the future, and throw man back into a state of idleness and objectless barbarism. His instructions to give a man a cloak if he steals a coat, is simply a premium for crime. The turning of the left cheek to be smitten if the right is thus attacked, would be craven, unmanly and productive of no good. The scourging and beating of money-changers was not extremely lamb-like. Getting angry at a fig tree, and cursing it because it did not bear figs at the wrong season of the year, did not indicate forbearance, discretion or good judgment.

We cannot see that the teachings of Jesus possess any superiority over those of the sages who lived before him. They appear no more godlike, no more exalted, and no more inspired than the maxims of his predecessors. As his were subsequent productions, they cannot be the original, and sound much like plagiarisms and piracies.

From what is here shown, but one conclusion is possible, and that is, that the system of Christianity is of a composite character, and was made up of the dogmas, legends and traditions of the older heathen systems which preceded it, and that it is only PAGANISM in a revised form.

And it is this revised system of ancient dogmas and absurdities, that in this country we are paying $200,000,000 yearly to support, and the return it yields is meagre indeed. We hail, however, the light of Science and truth, which will ultimately drive all pagan dogmas from the world.

The foregoing references and quotations are from Sir Wm. Jones' Asiatic Researches, Max Muller, Jaccotot, Taylor's "Diegesis," Higgins' "Anaclypsis," and last, but not least, Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," a recent publication and a most valuable work touching the subject here considered.

A Kind Notice from an Honored Source.

The Investigator of the 8th inst. has the following friendly notice of us:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER, our Liberal auxiliary of New York, is to be issued weekly in January. It is an able paper, doing good service in the cause of Reason and Humanity, and we are glad to learn its prospects of success are encouraging."

"We see it stated, that its worthy Editor has been converted to Spiritualism. He has obtained what he deems convincing evidence of its truth, and, like an honest man, candidly avows it. We shall do the same when we are convinced, for as truth is our object, we gladly accept it from any quarter, and follow wherever it may lead. But at present we are satisfied with Materialism, because we regard it as the only philosophy in accordance with the teachings of nature and reason."

We thank our friends for their kind notice of us. The "conversion" referred to has not been late nor sudden. For several years we have felt that we had received proofs of the existence of an intelligence not connected with physical bodies, and the Spiritual theory accounts for it to our mind better than any other. We have not been a persistent investigator of Spiritual phenomena, but we have in several instances received proofs of the continued existence of departed friends that we could not ignore; nor do we think we were imposed upon.

We are, however, far from accepting all that is presented as Spiritualism, nor do we believe in the honesty of all who claim to be mediums. We doubt not a great amount of imposition has been practiced upon the credulous. We are firm in the conviction that our first and principal duty pertains to the people, and the affairs of this world, and the duties of this life. With all we can be told of the life after this, we can really know but little about it, and we are quite content to wait patiently for the other world until we go there. We find ample work here to occupy all our efforts, attention and highest impulses. Our motto is, ONE WORLD AT A TIME. While here let us try to do the best we can for this world, and make it as much better as lies in our power. It will be time enough to make provisions for the other world when we know better what its necessities, wants and requirements are. If we pass our time usefully and honorably in this life, we need entertain no fears regarding the next.

Notwithstanding any leaning we may have towards the Spiritual philosophy, we are still a Materialist, believing that what is not matter, in some form or other, is nothing. If spirits really exist, they are real, organized bodies of refined or highly sublimated matter. They may be just as real as though perceptible to our visual organs. We well know hydrogen, oxygen, chlorine, carbonic acid and many other gases are invisible, but they form more than three-fourths of the material of our globe, and are just as real, when unseen, as are granite and marble.

Aside from any evidence we have of a continued existence, we are well satisfied that the doctrine should be true. This life, at best, is short and imperfect, and it would almost seem that existence, with thousands, is a failure if this is all there is of it; besides there is a happiness in believing that after a few more toilsome years we shall rejoin friends who have gone before, and meet, too, the old worthies and moral heroes who lived in the earlier ages of the world, like Socrates, Plato, Galileo, Spinoza and many others.

While we heartily affiliate with our Materialistic friends, and work with them heart and hand in the struggle for mental liberty and to overthrow superstition and error, we fear some of them are too unwilling to investigate spiritual phenomena—that they entertain a prejudice against the philosophy, and are loth to place themselves in the way of becoming acquainted with the real facts. It is as possible for unbelievers to become bigoted as any other class of people in the world. Let us all be willing to become acquainted with what is transpiring around us, and be ready to acknowledge proof when it is made apparent to us.

We confess we aspire to be a "connecting link," a nyphen, if you please, between Materialists on one hand and Spiritualists on the other. We wish to see harmony and fraternity prevail in our entire ranks. Differ as we may on the point whether this state of existence is merely a rudimental one, preparatory to a continued and more perfect life or whether this is all there is of us, and that when we close our eyes in death we enter into an eternal sleep, let us not forget we have a common enemy which requires our constant and united vigilance, the false theologies, superstitions, and fables handed down from the days of gross ignorance and error. We alike are opposed to the power and pernicious influence of the Church, and to the heavy rule and machinations of Priestcraft, the most onerous, expensive, and bloody tyranny this unfortunate world has ever known. In opposing these evils, in spreading light, truth, and general intelligence, in aiming to improve the condition of humanity, and in benefitting the world so far as in our power, we can assuredly act in union and full accord. Let us not diverge or wrangle, but maintain a spirit of union and toleration.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, just starting out upon his Fall and Winter lecturing campaign, made us a call, while passing through our city. He will spend this month in this State, except while holding a second debate with the Rev. John Marples, which will come off at Toronto, Ont., about the 20th or 25th inst.

We are happy in announcing that Bro. Underwood has consented to take subscriptions for our proposed new work, "THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS AND THINKERS," which we have decided to get up in what is called a "crown-octavo" size, of eight hundred pages or over, on fine paper, with beautiful binding, and containing a steel-plate engraving of your humble servant, the author, and all for the moderate price of three dollars, and to be furnished in the early part of 1876. Our friend will be glad to take all the names for the work he can, and we assuredly will be well pleased to have the list as large as possible.

Orders are coming in every day for the work, but we still hope large numbers will subscribe for it who have not yet done so. We agree, that if any parties who order the book are displeased with it upon receiving it, to take it back and refund the money.

Mr. Underwood will also take subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hope friends who are not now on our list, will not be backward in coming forward and joining the noble band of Truth Seekers who are pressing on to light, freedom and glory. Remember from Sept. 1st to Jan. 1st, the price is only 50 cents; then it becomes a Weekly at $2 a year. That amount will surely break no one, and we shall endeavor to make the paper worth the money. Who next will join our ranks?

A BROTHER IN NEED.—R. M. Casey, of Pendleton, S. C., a firm and worthy Liberal, has been ostracised for his heretical opinions in the bigoted community where he resides, and thrown out of employment. He has, besides, been sick for several months and his finances have become reduced. He wishes to travel in the territory contiguous to him, selling Liberal Books, Pamphlets and Tracts, and he wishes to borrow from friends in the Liberal ranks sufficient means to procure a horse and wagon for the purpose. He appeals to the Liberals of the country for assistance, and thinks he will be able to return in twelve months such amounts as may be loaned to him.

We can say for him that he is a reliable, true man, and the object he has in view is a commendable one. Those who feel disposed to extend aid to him to assist him to start may address him as above, and will confer a favor upon a worthy brother. We propose to furnish him with Books, Pamphlets and Tracts, but he wishes also a horse and wagon. How many will lend him ten, or five, or two dollars each?

A SLIGHT ERROR. Many of our readers doubtless noticed a mistake in date on the first page of our last. It was Aug. 15th, when it should have been Sept. 1st. The date on fifteen of the pages was right, but on the first page it was wrong. This was, of course, an unintentional error, and the printer and proof-reader assume all blame for it.

Some provoking errors also occurred in an article entitled, "The Reign of Law," by D. Higbee, M.D., as follows: In 12th line from top, for attractive repulsion it should be attraction and repulsion; in 33d line for religion or spirituality—morality, it should read religion or spirituality or morality; on 83d line, instead of entrapped, read enrapport; 86th line, instead of harmony, discord, read harmony and discord; 2d column, for changes read charges.

We mean to be careful and avoid errors, but it seems we sometimes fall short. We will try in the future to do better.

WE HEREBY ANNOUNCE that J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, of Bronson, Mich., is duly authorized to act as agent for THE TRUTH SEEKER in receiving subscriptions, etc. We have all confidence in the gentleman, and advise those in want of rare Liberal works to send to him for a catalogue. He keeps many rare European and "O. P." works not often met with.

Creed—Mulum in Parvo.

I believe in God, Father and Mother, in whose likeness man will be, when they grow to it.

I believe in Jesus and Ann, and in all, who, like them, do right, because it is right, irrespective of cost.

I believe in communion of saints, and in courtesy to sinners, deeming it no part of my duty to insult any because they see not as I see.

I believe in the resurrection of body and soul from unphysiological diets, habits and appetites—from low ambitions, carnal indulgences, and misuse of reproductive powers—and from their use, by such as aspire to life everlasting. Amen.

P. S. Honest people are not hungry for forgiveness—they prefer meeting their liabilities, like honest men.

"Respectable" Commercial Firms.

Failures amongst moneyed institutions, manufacturing and trading firms, have lately occurred in such numbers that the public is really astonished. To a certain extent these collapses are not at all inexplicable. They teach a moral lesson, they prove that corruption, swindling, and immorality, are wide spread evils in the higher stratum of society. They show us the evil side of the accumulation of large capital under the control of single persons or a corporation. The accumulation and control of capital by the single individual cannot be avoided, nor can it be called an evil in every case. But the capital so controlled should under all circumstances be employed for the benefit of society in general. Not that we favor a dispossession of the capitalist but we ask a control over the employment of his capital to prevent him from using it to the disadvantage of society.

Capitalists that are partly working with money entrusted to them by others ought to be put under strict surveillance. If a banker instead of limiting himself to legitimate business, speculates in stocks, cotton or sugar, let him make known this to the public in the same way as the distiller, rectifier, wholesale or retail dealer in spirits, is compelled to write his special occupation or trade on his sign, according to the government license. Any banker that uses money entrusted to him by confiding customers in wild goose speculations, is a swindler, and ought to be prosecuted as such. But society is so accustomed to this mode of swindling, that as a general rule, it is not even called by its true name. Or did you ever see the so-called "free Press" expose any fraud or swindle committed by the higher classes of the commercial community? The biggest frauds in the country, the Erie Railroad now under investigation by duped English capitalists, the exploded Northern Pacific Railroad swindle, unsound Life and Fire Insurance Companies, the busted "Life of Christ" concern etc., find warm defenders amongst the leading journals of the country. The Press knows the power of corporations. Look for instance at the nominal capital of our railroads amounting to forty-two hundred millions, with yearly gross receipts of five hundred million dollars, enormous sums comparatively controlled by a few men. Similar amounts are controlled by Insurance Companies and banking institutions. The handling of this immense capital by the few, a servile Press, a corrupt State and General Government, point out the danger that is threatening society.

The career and tragic end of the President of the Bank of California, prove the elasticity of our social life, and the great difficulty of large capital being handled by the single individual to the lasting benefit of the general public. Steamboat clerk, banker, ten times a millionaire, fifty thousand dollars a year salary, a princely household, collapse, and a Coroner's inquest.

The success of a man in acquiring a fortune by mere speculation is a dangerous precedent, a bad example, that bears an evil influence on the morals of our young men, who ought to look at the accumulation of money and financial independence, as acquired or reached only by means of honest toil, persistency, and prudent management. A single winner at the green table, will lure a hundred victims into ruin. We close this little article by copying the following letter:

NEW YORK, 312 East 14th street, Sept. 1st, 1875.

DUNCAN, SHERMAN & Co., Gentlemen; Some days before you went into bankruptcy, I purchased from you a draft on Berlin amounting to $30. The same has since been returned dishonored causing to me a loss, which for a man in my circumstance can be called a heavy one.

Seeing your statement showing about five millions liabilities and two million assets, knowing that amongst the victims of misplaced confidence are a great many that are reduced to want by losing the savings of half a life time, and then observing, the remark made in one of the highly intelligent journals of the great American "free" Press, that sympathy and regret is expressed at the fall of the old and respected banking house, I simply ask myself, where have we come to?

Daily we hear people inquire, what is the cause of the stagnation in trade the dullness in our manufacturing districts and the bad times in general. The proper answer is, corruption in politics, fictitious manipulations in incorporated moneyed institutions, high living, speculation and gambling in paper values and gold, and swindling, operations of banking institutions, that have succeeded in giving themselves a color of fair dealing and respectability. It is almost impossible that houses like J. C. & Co., T. Bros., D. S. & Co., and the Bank of California, could have gone into bankruptcy, if they had limited themselves to legitimate business. If you had been honest enough to write on your sign: "Duncan, Sherman & Co., bankers and speculators in stocks and cotton, with means furnished by customers," the class of people that loose now all they possessed would have avoided you as they do the banker, that is doing business in Havana lottery tickets or forged bonds.

Let one or more of the newspapers that form part of a Press, which is erroneously called the American "free" Press, express sympathy, the public in general, your victims especially can only feel contempt for you. Fisk, Gould, Tweed, Beecher, and others of the same stamp found their advocates and defenders, but honest, unbiased people condemn public plunderers, financial and spiritual frauds nevertheless.

I enclose the above mentioned draft. The 25 or 30 per cent. that may at some future time be offered in settlement I decline to accept. Let the product be used for the purchase of a marble tablet to be set up in a conspicuous place in Wall street, and containing the names of all dishonest bankers, swindling stockbrokers, and gold gamblers, as a warning to people of moderate means to keep them away from "respectable" thieves. Yours etc.,

M. STEIN.

Paine Hall.

OFFICE OF M. ALTMAN & Co., }
301 & 303 Sixth Avenue, N. Y. }

MR. EDITOR: The letter published in your last number, by A. K. Butts, has just attracted my attention, and causes surprise. I think he should make himself slightly acquainted with the Paine Hall matter before attempting to explain the difference existing between the Trustees.

I have not the time nor inclination to go into an extended resumé of these differences, only to say that Messrs. Mendum, Seaver, and Savage, hold the Paine Hall Property, in their own individual name as joint tenants—not as Trustees—that they refused over and over again, to vest the title in the name of the Trustees as such to be held in perpetuity for the cause it was built, and that they incurred obligations to the amount of over $100,000 when they were expressly limited to $60,000, by a formal vote of the Board of Trustees at its first and only regular meeting, held May 8th, 1874; that they occupy more of the Building for their own use than they have a right to, that they have, in fact, violated—whether intentionally or unintentionally I know not—nearly every resolution passed by the Board at that, its only regular meeting. I beg that every reader who is interested in this matter, and Mr. Butts in particular, will refer to the Investigator, published first after the above date, where it will show what the Board of Trustees agreed and resolved to do, and learn by subsequent facts what they, M. S. & S., have done. I also refer to D. R. Burt, one of the Trustees; G. L. Henderson, a subscriber; B. F. Underwood, who all know the facts of the difficulty, and many others to bear me out, when I say, Mr. Butts knows nothing about the matter he attempts to explain, and that there is an honest (I hope) difference between three of the Trustees, and the remaining two as well as a deep seated dissatisfaction, in the minds of many true "Liberals." Excuse the haste with which this is written; if particulars are wanted, the above gentlemen referred to can supply them.

Yours truly,
M. ALTMAN,
Trustee P. H. F., and Sec y. of the Board.

"Prayer to the Devil"

Certain of our excellent friends hereabout, belonging it would seem, to that large class who are "more nice than wise, have seen fit to express themselves quite shocked at the article named above, and some estimable and highly educated gentlemen took occasion to express themselves in favor of a more kid-glovey style of warfare than our veteran editor sees fit to pursue. The writer happening to hear some of these conversations, although a "mere looker on here in Vienna" wishes to say that to his thinking, the article above mentioned is the brightest bit of writing that he remembers to have seen, emanating from this side of the Atlantic for a twelvemonth. The idea is original, the conception a good one, and the treatment excellent. It hits dogma a fair blow between the eyes, and is up to the best things of Voltaire, who not only knocked Christianity down, but jumped on it and squelched all the breath out of its body. And now a few words as to the good taste of fighting a manly battle for the truth. The most striking fact in the history of human opinion is the constant tendency of error to perpetuate itself, to carry itself forward into succeeding social states, where its presence is most noxious, breeding hypocrisy, and all manner of falsehoods. This is the position of Christianity to-day. The humane ideals of this age, its instincts for universal justice leave Christianity to be seen as nothing but a gigantic scheme for obtaining money under false pretenses, and the quicker it is dead, buried, and put out of sight the better. And how is this to be done if we are to fight it in mittens? It is well to note that Christianity is neither based upon, nor sustained by intellectual convictions, so, to fight it only with intellectual weapons is like shooting a shadow with cannon balls. The missiles and the object is unlike in substance, and you may shoot it through and through a thousand times without producing the slightest result. As a matter of fact the Christian teachings have been shown to be both contradictory and absurd, times almost without number, yet the effect is almost unappreciable. Why is this? The reason is here: Christianity is based upon the passions: First, upon the grand passion for the marvelous; no reason can ever touch that; next, the passionate desire to live forever, a wish, which, as it exists in most men, it is difficult to over-estimate. With these two passions artfully stimulated to their highest point by an artful priesthood, it is a matter of the greatest difficulty for reason to make head. Hence the necessity to show the degrading, self-seeking character of the Christian religion. It is essentially the religion of the courtier, praising and fawning upon the supposed dispenser of favors—temples erected for the praise of God! Faugh! Every self-respecting man is above being praised. How much more a God should be above such pettiness. The very virtue of humility as taught by the Church is a degrading one, happily satirized in Dickens's Uriah Heep. No man can act worthily without proper self respect, which cannot comport with the degrading religion of the Bible. A life starting out with the idea of living to please God is poisoned in its very fountains. Why please God, can't he please himself? The object should be to be happy one's self, and to make others happy. Again the maxim "If thine enemy smite thee on thy right cheek etc. is sound neither in common sense nor practice. The gentle and unresisting heathen races have always fallen a prey to their savage and aggressive Christian neighbors. Witness the example of the unresisting negro, the only example of perfect forgiveness that the world has ever seen. How utterly thrown away is their example on their barbarous Christian masters, let the story of their wrongs teach. To-day sees Christianity in league with the strong against the weak, everywhere the ally of tyranny and oppression, seeking to incite a bloody war between France and Germany in its most unholy interests, forbidding the education of women, and the amelioration of their social condition, and, in short, arranging itself for a pitched battle against the ever advancing forces of our modern civilization. Shall we be compelled to fight a monster like this with our hands tied behind us and our mouths full of polite phrases? At best, it is a contest between an overgrown Goliath and a little David, let not the arm of the assailant be shackled! The writer is not among these who regard with unmingled satisfaction the spectacle of Christianity being undermined by indirect approaches, and made ready to be toppled over without warning. The amount of degrading fear and falsity caused by this course is appalling. The spectacle of a man like Stuart Mill going to his grave with his deepest convictions unuttered is anything but a pleasant one. But shame must lie at the doors of that arrogant priesthood who seek to make error a synonym for sin. Then there is the danger of suddenly overturning a Church, that has a certain imperfect moral teaching mixed up with its superstitious, before there is a higher organized moral training prepared to take its place. One of the grossest and most harmful of all popular errors is the conviction that religion is above morals: it is only above morals as superstition is above reason, or the wildest and most excited emotion is above the dictates of the sober common sense.

Lecky, and many enlightened men to the contrary, I would beg leave to aver that the science of morals is yet in its infancy. The century that sees the Utilitarian theory of morals seriously contested, is too much in the background to form any adequate conception of its possibilities and requirements. The whole intellectual side of moral science is yet to be created. The means whereby the strong and cunning are to be prevented from grasping everything, the means by which a passion for justice and an enthusiasm for doing good are to be created, lie yet in the undiscovered country. The essentials of these principles are blocked out in the minds of advanced thinkers, but their development is yet in the future. The means of securing harmony in social life, the methods by which hope, variety, novelty, and a passionate and absorbing interest in human well-being, are to infuse so fresh and healthful an interest into human life are not only undiscovered, but almost unsought. Why is this? Evidently because Christianity has directed attention from this world to the next, and away from all effort toward improvement, to a base acquiescence in the ills from which we suffer. It has not only done this, but it has made war on human nature and human happiness substituting dogma for reason and dictum for truth.

It is but just to note, however, that when imperfections of conduct, or even positive vices on the part of Christians, are alleged as evidence against the church, an unfair advantage is taken, unless indeed Christians as a body are proved to be more vicious than non-Christians. This will hardly be claimed, for as a rule Christians are, in thought as well as in conduct, infinitely above their religion. How many, think you, among the millions of professing Christians, would condemn a fellow being to the torment of eternal, or even one day's flames for any imaginable offence? The answer must be, not one. This shows that a civilized people have outgrown a barbarous religion. But all the odium under which the Church labors, in consequence of its atrocious martyrdoms inflicted on heretics is well deserved, because, while she has ceased the practice of burning men and women, she still promulgates doctrines that lead directly to that result. The conscientious leaders in the church are deserving of sympathy. Their position is identical with that in which the English Government recently found itself. A verdict against the keeper of an aquarium was given in conformity with the law, against keeping open on Sunday. The Government dared neither to imprison the keeper nor repeal the law, so an act was passed empowering the Home Secretary to remit the penalty in all such cases. In like manner the Church dares neither disavow in time the barbarous part of its creed, nor yet does it dare to teach it, so that our motto should be, war without finching against all barbarous, terrible and terrifying dogmas, and the worship of depraved gods, coupled with a kindly charity for those sincere leaders in the church whose positions are full of difficulties, and becoming fuller every day. The Keely Motor.

The following letter from our friend D. R. Burt appeared in a late number of The Dubuque Times. Recent reports indicate that Keely & Co., are feeling very hopeful of speedy and great results from the "Motor." A new gauge has been constructed for the Motor, showing a pressure of 54,000 pounds to the square inch. That immense pressure can be obtained, perhaps must be admitted, but whether it can be made continuous and persistent so as to be adapted to the varied uses of machinery, is the problem to be solved. If it is a practicable result, it will, as friend Burt says, be one of the most stupendous discoveries in the history of civilization. If, by mechanical combination, or the decomposition of water, such immense power can be secured without danger or heavy expense, the results will be incalculable. That the Hydrogen and Oxygen, of which water is composed, will yet, in the scientific discoveries to be made, be separated, by a cheap, practical process, and be used immensely for creating light, heat and motive power, we feel confident. The beauty of the thing will be, the material cannot be exhausted, as, after being used, the elements will again unite in the re-formation of water.

DULEITH, Ill., Aug. 5th.

DEAR FRIEND: While at Philadelphia, as I stated to you before starting thither was my intention, I visited Mr. Keely and Mr. Charles B. Collier, the latter the Attorney for the Keely Motor Company. I was introduced by letters from friends; and on presenting them was received with due and proper courtesy, and given as full a description and explanation as the condition of said motor and a proper discretion with regard to the hidden machinery and the secret method of developing the hitherto unknown power would justify. Something like a score of men, each and every one of them occupying a respectable position in society, with a reputation for truth, candor, and the strictest integrity, declare they have seen sufficient to lead them to firmly believe, and a part of the number say they do know and fully understand, that the power claimed to be developed by Mr. Keely is a positive and absolute fact. These persons are borne out in their statements by the corroborative testimony of such men as William H. Rutherford, Chief Engineer of the United States Navy; William Bokel, Mechanician; B. Howard Rand, Professor of Chemistry; J. Snowden Bell, Mechanical Engineer; G. F. Glocker, of Philadelphia; Henry C. Sargeant, 382 Second Avenue, New York; C. H. Haswell, New York, etc.

John W. Keely is as fine a specimen of physical and intellectual manhood as we rarely meet with. He has given two years to study and experiments in developing the said motive power, and declares, in the most earnest and impressive manner, that he can produce, and has produced, in the most inappreciable period of time, an expansive vapor having an elastic energy of ten thousand pounds to the square inch, using only three agents, to wit: a mechanical structure which he calls a generator; atmospheric air; and natural water; and these, unaided by any chemical compound, heat, electricity or galvanism. The above he declares his willingness to verify by oath, and if not fully correct, to suffer the pains and penalties attached by law to the crime of perjury. He only asks of the public an indulgence of four month's time to finish his new and more perfect generator, and the drawings and specifications necessary in order to obtain letters patent in our own and other countries. Mr. Keely and his friends and gentlemen connected with the invention have been visited with the severest abuse, and unjust and unkind philippics from the Scientific American of New York, the Journal of Chemistry of Boston, and other papers, calling these men tricksters, swindlers, etc. I regret that journals having the reputation of being good authority upon scientific subjects, and not claiming (as might be inferred from their manner of treating this subject) to have reached the ultimatum of all knowledge and to be gifted with omniscience, should treat in this way men who have given their lives to patient and untiring study, investigation and experiment, to learn the hidden forces of nature, and how to command them for the happiness of man. I would say, spare your condemnation, and cease your caviling, gentlemen, for a brief time, and prepare yourselves to welcome the advent of one of the most stupendous discoveries, fraught with more momentous consequences to the happiness of mankind than any other in the history of civilization. Its effect upon our industrial, commercial, political, social and moral condition, can scarcely be reached by the wildest flights of imagination; and from evidence shown I hope—belief in abeyance—that in less than the time already given to the discovery of this force, our ships of war will be propelled, and their shot discharged by the same power. Yours very respectfully, D. R. BURT.

A Dangerous Confidence Swindle.

What means are used by the Church to strengthen its hold on the credulous ignorant masses.

MR. EDITOR: Encouraged by your readiness to devote the columns of our influential paper to correspondence tending to spread light or to trample darkness under foot, to destroy old, fatal, superstitious ideas, the writer of this sends you a correct copy of a prayer, in pamphlet form, sold by a Catholic priest to one of his flock, an Irish girl. Is it not about time, that these poor unfortunates were enlightened as to the worth (or rather worthlessness) of the so-called consecrated talismans and charms, and other devices, sold to them under the false pretense that it will guard them against accidents and misfortunes of all kinds?

The priests keep these people and their children in ignorance, and use such despicable means, to swindle them out of their hard earned money.

The prayer speaks for itself and you can dissect it and prove the incorrectness of most of its statements.

Yours Respectfully,

A. H.

THE HOLY PRAYER.

The following prayer was found in the grave of our Lord Jesus Christ in the year 803, and sent by the Pope to the Emperor Charles as he was going to battle. They who shall repeat it every day, or hear it repeated, shall never die a sudden death; nor be drowned in water; nor shall they fall into the hands of their enemies in battle.

Being read over a woman in labour, she shall be delivered safely and be a glad mother. When the child is born, lay it on his or her right side, and he or she, shall not be troubled with misfortunes; and if you see any one in fits, lay on his or her right side, and he or she shall stand up and thank GOD; and they who repeat it in my house shall be blessed by the LORD and he that laughs at it shall suffer.

Believe this to be certain, it is as true as the Holy Evangelist had written it. They who keep it about them shall not fear thunder or lightning; those who repeat it every day, shall have three days mourning before their death.

"Holy Cross of Christ ward off from me all weapons of danger. Oh, Holy Cross of Christ ward off from me all things that are evil. Oh, Holy Cross of Christ protect me in the right way of happiness. Oh, Holy Cross of Christ ward off from me all dangerous deaths, and give me life always. Oh, Jesus of Nazareth, have mercy on me now and forever.—Amen. In honor of our Lord Jesus Christ. In honor of his sacred passion. In honor of his holy resurrection and godlike ascension, to watch me and bring me the right way to heaven. True as Jesus Christ was born on Christmas day in the stable. True as he was crucified on Friday. True as the three Kings brought their offerings to Jesus on the thirteenth day. True as he ascended into heaven, so the honor of Jesus will keep us from our enemies, visible and invisible, now and forever.—Amen.

"Oh Lord Jesus Christ have mercy on me. Mary and Joseph pray for me. Nicodemus and Joseph who took the Lord down from the Cross and buried him. Oh, Lord Jesus Christ, by your sufferings on the Cross when parting out of the world give me grace that I may carry my cross patiently with dread and fear. When I suffer, and that without complaining, and that I may escape danger, now and forever. Amen."

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. XII.

Friend S—Thesays, "if infidels are more moral than Christians, their morality does not depend upon the faith which they advocate. Free thought, free words, and free actions do not bring morality." But I say, if Infidels are more moral than Christians, and they are undoubtedly so, as a class—is not this a proof that their peculiar ideas are the cause of this superiority? They realize that this world is all, and if they do not find happiness here, they will never find it, so they make the most and the best of what they have now, instead of wearing long faces, and calling this beautiful earth "a world of sin and woe" and declaring that "man is born to misery as the sparks fly upwards" and "sin and iniquity are his natural birth right." Infidels believe that purity, goodness and love, a sound body and a sound mind are the natural heirship of all that live; and it is their aim to have each child born and reared with a full complement of these, or as nearly so as possible. It is far worse robbery to bring into the world a child deprived of any of the natural faculties, or feeble or sickly in constitution and intellect, through our own transgression of moral or physical laws; than it is to steal or take from them mere wealth or property in money, or its equivalent. Yet how many Christian believers lead immoral, corrupt, and debasing lives, begetting weak, puny, idiotic or sickly children! Our hospitals, asylums and jails are full of such; and for all the misery these and other unfortunates suffer here upon the earth, they have only the promise of, under almost or quite impossible conditions, a visionary heaven hereafter—so very visionary indeed, that not one in five hundred is in any hurry to leave even this "despised world" for its doubtful happiness.

Now free thoughts do produce morality, for they culminate in free action. Where there is no real freedom there is no morality. Even you Christians admit free-will, else you claim there could be no sin; and what more or less is free will than freedom throughout? No Infidel claims or asks more than a liberty to do as his "free will" impels him. If we have this we have all the three freedoms you so condemn, and we do really have them, while you only pretend to have free will, whereas all the time you are actually slaves! You dare not think any further than your preacher, creed and church will allow you. You have no free will at all, as long as you must believe in Christianity—blindly follow Christ, Creed and Church, run in one old rut till it is worn so deep that you cannot see any way out of it without upsetting all your present view on all that is, and rendering your minds a perfect chaos of confusion; so that you keep right on in that old rut year after year, generation after generation, and refuse to see, hear or think of any light save that old "tallow dip" of your great, great grandfathers. You cling to your ancient God of Battles, and his musty records of an age long gone by—an age which recorded vulgarities and obscenities so coarse and low and vile, that men and women have lain for weeks and months in our jails and prisons for merely quoting them without comment from this holy God-book. You look back among the Troglodytic forefathers expecting there to find all of perfection, gentleness and morality—for does not that delectable book say "man was created perfect" and consequently the nearer you can reach back through the ages to that state of existence the more nearly perfect you expect to become.

"Backward, ye presumptuous nations,
Man to misery is born!
Born to drudge, and sweat and suffer;
Born to labor and to pray!
Kings and priests are God's Vicegerents,
Man must worship and obey—
Back! be humble and obey."

Infidels alone live out and practice free will. If there be any such thing as freedom, they only are free who are at liberty to follow truth wherever it leads, and give the fullest expression to each and every idea and thought. This honesty of sentiment moulds their whole lives toward honesty in all things. They also know there can be no "remission of sin" that if they do wrong, there is no escape from the penalty. Scapegoats, substitutes and saviors are creations of a past age—so each must now work out his own salvation from evil, and build for himself as he selects to live; and all this helps to make better men and better women. If free thoughts, words and actions do not bring morality, why not say at once that Slavery is better than freedom, and return to the old time submission to kings, priests and popes, as the best condition of society? Why boast of this "land of the free," if freedom is no blessing? and why make we such an ado over our National Constitution because of its toleration of all creeds and systems of belief, if such freedom does not tend to a higher and better morality? Why is the world all the time abolishing all manner of slavery, priestcraft and Jesuitism? Why are our laws becoming year by year more lax and lenient? Why are all the more barbaric modes of punishment gradually becoming things of the past? Why are our criminals each year treated more and more as subjects of insanity—victims of a bad organization and a wrong, training, rather than as wilfully bad, vile or vicious? Why do we treat our children more and more as equals, as deserving the respect and politeness, which we aforesaid only bestowed upon strangers, "company," and elders? Is not all this the outgrowth of that Freethought which you Christians so cry down and despise? Is it not because Infidels, reformers, scientists and all the advanced intellects of the day recognize the perfect freedom and equality of every individual? The less of law, the less of the force-system we have, the larger will be the quota of real Simon-pure morality. We may cow people down into an outward, cringing, seeming servility by force, cruelty and oppression, but of what real utility to the world will such slaves of tyranny be? Point to one great, good and noble deed which such as these have ever done, and we grant you that there may be one argument against freedom. On the other hand, mark the free, enlightened, independent thinker. Erect, firm, unfaltering, he flinches from no fact; he braves and dares all in his pursuit of truth, knowing that however dazzling and beautiful all else may seem, it is only base counterfeit, and will not wear or stand the test of time. He realizes that each individual is but part of the great whole of humanity, and that upon the weal of one depends that of all.

Then sons of freedom! wake to glory!
Hark! hark! what myriads bids you rise,
Your children, wives and grandsires hoary.
Behold their tears and hear their cries,
Oh liberty, can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy glorious flame?
Can dungeons, bolts and bars confine thee,
Or whips thy noble spirit tame?

The Society of Friends.

Under this caption I do not purpose giving a general history of the Quaker Church, but will confine myself principally to what is known as the West Branch Monthly Meeting, of which I am a member. I presume our little band will utter a hearty amen to all I may say although I have not consulted with them for some time, owing to my absence on business, and cannot say positively that my sketch will accord with the feelings of our congregation. However, if one or more should dissent, I take the responsibility upon myself.

Friends, were originally a peaceful, harmless, honest, non-resistant people, but owing to our principle of non-resistance we were soon dubbed "Quakers" by the wicked outside world, which means cowards, and we gradually degenerated into the condition requisite to fit the name. It was an outrage at the time, to be so dubbed for we were morally brave even to martyrdom which many of our society had to suffer. We learned from the Holy Bible that "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. . . . For if ye be without chastisement then are ye bastards and not sons." (Heb. xii, 6, 8.) This encouraged us, and we kept on in the even tenor of our way, and gained in numbers until we obtained to a standing along side of some of the popular Churches. We then began to grow corrupt, work for power or leadership, and soon dissensions arose and we quarrelled and split, and fought for possession of the Church-property, and finally became known as "Orthodox" and "Hicksites."

We of the West Branch Meeting profess to be Hicksites, but we are really Orthodox in faith. Elias Hicks, we find, taught in his last writings that he could set down no stakes, could give us no creed, but could only admonish us to "follow the light within." This we found was too loose for us. It would lead to Spiritualism. Consequently we repudiated Elias Hicks and fell back upon God's Holy Word. This we take literally and mean to carry it out to the letter as soon as we can get control of the Government.

We are now doing the best we can under the circumstances. All who differ from us in opinion, or become Spiritualists, we promptly ostracise and disown and expel from our meeting, and bid them god-speed to hell, for that is what we turn them out for, when we consider them no longer fit to be accounted as "one of us." It will be our greatest joy in the great hereafter to gaze down into the pit of hell and see those recreant members, bound hand and foot, burning, writhing, seething, in the lake of fire and brimstone that burneth forever, and is not quenched. All glory to a great and just God.

Our meeting, before the advent of Spiritualism, was very prosperous. We had a large house well-filled every "Fifday" and "Firsday." No matter what work was on hand, every member would drop it and go to meeting. The young folks as well as the old, could say "Thee" to each other, and all went well. Time brought many things to bear against us. "Fashion" worked its way in, both in the matter of apparel and in speech, some married out of the church and were disowned; others of the young joined other churches, the aged kept dying off, the young grew up in the way of the world in spite of us, and now after expelling the Spiritualists, we have very few members left. Some of our meetings are blank, and of the rest we have an attendance of one or more.

And where are we now? What is left of us? "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." We have been mad. We have been told by impartial judges that we have expelled our best members. It is true. We acknowledge that nearly all the talent went with the expelled members. But we thought they would all come down on their knees and recant their heresies and beg to be retained in the church. They did not do it. We had then gone so far with our persecuting scheme that we could not back out with any degree of honor, and so we had to expel them. We know we have done wrong to our fellow men in the sight of the Lord, and we turn to the Bible for consolation. But what do we find? "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord. . . . Wealth and riches shall be in his house." (Ps. cxii, 1, 3.) "In the house of the righteous is much treasure." (Prov. xv, 6.) Great God! We are all poor even to poverty. Have we no escape from the laws and teachings of the Old Testament? No! Hear what Christ says: "I am not come to destroy the law but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of the least Commandments and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. v, 17, 18, 19.) And how many of these Commandments have we kept? Let us look at some of them:—"This is my covenant, which ye shall keep between me and you, and thy seed after thee. Every man and child among you shall be circumcised." (Gen. xvii, 10.) "And the swine because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you; ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcass." (Deut. xiv, 8.) "Thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement." (Ex. xxix, 36.) To these and to nearly all other laws or Commandments in the Holy Bible, we have paid no heed. Now it is too late. We have broken and re-broken God's laws until we can but cry out, "O Lord, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways and hardened our hearts?" (Is. lxiii, 17.) Why hast thou sent us strong delusion that we might believe a lie and be damned? (2 Thess. ii, 11.) We would pray, but it would avail nothing, "for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him." (Matt. vi, 8.) There is naught left for such as we are, but to weep and wail, for the Lord says: "Then shall ye call upon me, but I will not answer;" they shall seek me early, but shall not find me. (Prov. i, 28.) "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." (Rev. xiv, 11.)

Our minister has admonished us times innumerable to examine ourselves, but we were always too bigoted and self-righteous. We have of late, however, ventured to hearken unto his admonition, but I forbear disclosing even a tithe of what we found, for according to God's Holy Word, we are bound for hell any how. "All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." (Rev. xxi, 8.)

Freedom of Thought.

And why should I feel anxious to change another's opinion, especially of a matter utterly unknowable to us both, and of which no legal, logical or scientific proof is possible? Your "faith" is for yourself, not for me. And if you are satisfied with your own experience, so am I. Why, then, are you dissatisfied with mine? Why, then, does the Christian forbid my thinking for myself?

The Papist commands me, upon the penalties of eternal torments, to think as he does, and expressly forbids the right of private judgment. The Protestant, ostensibly allows the right of private judgment; but, in practice, denies it. A large majority of the Protestant sects allow no member to differ from the creed, the "Discipline," the "Thirty-nine Articles," or "Confession of Faith." Even a doubt in regard to the personality of the Devil, or the horrible doctrine of eternal torments, renders the member obnoxious to the sect, and his expulsion follows as a matter of course.

[THREE HUNDRED AND EIGHTH MEETING.]

MR. HANSON delivered a lecture on in which he endeavored to prove the existence of that mysterious being by the old arguments of design and necessity, as well as by human consciousness. He said he "felt God," and knew that he existed. His arguments were pretty effectually refuted by HENRY EVANS, G. L. HENDERSON and D. M. BENNETT. S. P. ANDREWS, H. M. T. WILCOX, HERMAN SHOOK, D. E. DE LARA and others participated in the discussion, which was spirited. MR. HANSON, in his reply, thought he had been personally assailed, but in this he was mistaken.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 3D.

[THREE HUNDRED AND NINTH MEETING.]

MR. A. P. REQUIER, of the New York Bar, read an eloquent and well-written paper; subject,

"The House that Jack Built."

He showed that the old nursery tale by this title had been handed down from ancient Chaldea, and he used it as a text, from which he spun out an eloquent sermon, likening the untenanted house, the malt, the rat, the cat, the dog, the cow, the maid, the young man and the priest to the varied qualities and conditions of humanity from a Swedenborgian standpoint, making the various animals typical or representative of unprogressed and elevated conditions of the human soul. It was interspersed with humor, pathos and fine sentiment, and was delivered in a masterly manner.

A lively discussion followed, which was participated in by MESSRS. HENDERSON, ANDREWS, EVANS, DAWSON, GARDNER and WILCOX.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 10TH.

[THREE HUNDRED AND TENTH MEETING.]

Our Vice-President, W. L. ORMSBY, JR., read a very humorous paper, entitled,

"The Modern Democritus; or, the Laughing Philosopher."

He alluded, in starting out, to the ancient Grecian philosopher, and at his laughing at the follies of the times in which he lived. He descanted on the utility of laughter and mirth, and upon the fact that the sentiments, characteristics and literature of a people were represented in its anecdotes and jokes.

He read a large number of witticisms and hits at the extravagances and follies of the times, interspersed with comments and philosophisms. His especial theory of "Enlightened Self Interest" being the grand moving principle of the human race, he illustrated with numerous comical anecdotes. The lecture, upon the whole, was a most amusing one, and was followed by a good-humored discussion, which was participated in by MR. HERMAN SHOOK, MR. DAWSON, S. P. ANDREWS, G. L. HENDERSON, MR. WILCOX and DR. LAMBERT. MESSRS. ANDREWS and HENDERSON related sundry anecdotes, which added materially to the hilarity of the occasion. Everybody present left the hall in a cheerful mood.

Appreciative.

PARIS, TEX., Aug. 14th.

FRIEND BENNETT: In the "TRUTH SEEKER" of Aug. 1st, I see many things to gladden the heart of the Progressive Free Thinker.

The first I will notice, is your enterprise, "The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers." Put me down for a copy. Such a work should be read and owned by every Liberal; most sincerely do I hope you may receive orders for it, as thick as leaves of Vallambrosia.

Every Infidel ought to strive to be wide awake, and well posted. We are so often met with the poor, stale, "Well, Infidelity will do to live by, but it will not do to die by," and as we have never died yet and cannot know how it may be, when our Christian friends and foes are weeping, groaning, hoping, and praying around us, as body and mind lose sense beneath the marble touch of Death, we ought to inform ourselves how it has been with those of our faith who have passed behind the veil.

I for one, have left behind me a good many of the mile stones of life, but the terrible shadow of superstition with its chill and dread, ever kept near me till a few months since. Somehow I have managed to get ahead of it, and life was never so sunny and pleasant as now. I love it better than ever, but I can say with reverence and candor, I have no fears of Death, and if my mind is clear in my dying moments, I expect to leave my testimony against the fearful dogmas that dwarfed my childhood and blighted my youth.

I am also pleased with the notice of Dr. Stone's book "The New Gospel of Health." As soon as I can I shall purchase it. Yes, that is the true way; let us do our own thinking, praying, and doctoring. Let us try hard to have sound bodies for sound minds.

The last thing I shall notice, for I see I am getting too lengthy, is a short article from "Liberal"; he, in my opinion is right. I feel so free and peaceful over my reprieve that if one of the "meek and lowly" followers should land me in the brimstone region, I should not try to pull my opponent in with me; by all means let us not stoop to fight with the carnal and infernal weapons of INTOLERANCE.

Indeed, I think I read the paper through, from beginning to end with a satisfied smile on my countenance. Respectfully yours, EDITH MONTROSE.

On Social Progress.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I observe [TRUTH SEEKER, July 21st.] that Dr. Marvin's history of the condition of New York society, in his Lecture to the Liberal Club "On the Literature of the Insane," did not provoke any comment from the members who took a part in the subsequent discussion. I am surprised at this, because a description of the condition of society in the chief city of this most progressed of nations, which is supposed to have inherited the experiences of improvement in European nations, presents one of the best examples of determining the Law of Progress, according to the historic method; that is, of comparing the existing condition with the history of the past condition of society.

The majority of the students of what Mill called "the great and vexed question of Progressiveness of Man and of Society," belong to a class called Progressionists, who maintain that the absolute course of individuals and nations can never be retrograde, but always onward and upward, though they admit the ultimate tending to dissolution. Another class called Degradationists, hold the opinion of the Ancients that the natural tendency of men and their works, is to degenerate. In the former class may be found placed such men as Spencer and Draper, of the latter class the late Hugh Miller is an extreme representative. He maintained that the mysterious element of degradation existed in the vertebrate classes of animals during the past geologic ages, and still exists; that in many nations. There have been and still are the elements of a state of ever sinking degradation; and that as unexceptional a theory of degradation may be set forth as of progressive development. Both Spencer and Huxley supported Miller's assertion that the geologic evidence usually supposed to prove a progression to a higher state is untrustworthy; and Lesley, the Pennsylvania State Geologist, says that the principle of degradation is too much ignored.

Another class of sociological students is composed of those who recognize the principles of progression and degradation, as both being operative in human affairs. Some believe, as Mill did thirty years ago, that "with occasional exceptions, the general tendency of man and society is to improvement to a better and happier state." But in a later essay, "On Civilization," Mill said that the present age is not advanced, or equally progressive in many kinds of particular improvements when compared with past ages. In some things it is stationary, in others even retrograde. There is not anything to morally and intellectually distinguish it; and he says, but for individual exertions, the tendency of human affairs would be to rapidly deteriorate. Humboldt, referring to the historic method of philosophising on social science by the study and analysis of the general parts of history, says: "If events could be traced to their true causes, the history of nations might solve the ever-recurring enigma of the retrograde oscillations experienced by the alternately progressive and retrograde movements of society." Sir Henry Maine, in his "Ancient Law," says, that so far from progress and improvement being the rule in social affairs, "the stationary condition of society is the rule, and the progressive the exception." The late Professor Cairnes illustrates this opinion by a reference to two historical facts. First, while a few nations, he instances the Greeks and Romans, rapidly advanced to a high state of civilization the great mass of mankind, he instances the Oriental nations, moved up to a certain point, then became stationary, and showed no disposition to move beyond. Second, during seven or eight centuries, the period known as the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, some of the most important nations steadily retrograded in their political and social movements.

I will now bring together the scattered references in Dr. Marvin's Lecture as to the existing condition of New York society, and then compare it with the condition of Roman society, previous to, and subsequent to the Fall of the Empire, including the period of the so-called Dark Ages. Dr. Marvin says, in answer to his question "Who are the Insane?" that the majority of men . . . are either savages or children, and understand such things only as appeal to the simplicity of their intellects. The brains of savages and children exhibit on dissection shallowness of sulci and feebleness of convolution. The cineritious, or thinking tissue, is deficient in quantity. To such minds it is useless to address prolonged argument, for they have not the faculty wherewith to appreciate logic.

They are children and mind childish things, and if you wish to make them understand you and profit by your discourse, you will have to address them in a childish language. In dissecting human brains nothing has more thoroughly impressed me than the poverty of thinking tissue which characterizes the average cerebrum. I am not speaking of leading merchants, bankers, financiers, and professional men, but of the rank and file of humanity." Marvin says, the language of the sane adult of the Nineteenth Century is that of commerce and science, not that of poetry. He says that we are surrounded by the insane (the rank and file of humanity) who possess the childish characteristic of imitation. Like children they live in their senses, and are ruled over by the imagination; like the child, the savage, and the poet, they live in an ideal world. To observe "who are the imitators—the automatic whose movements result rather from the medulla oblongata than the cerebrum. . . . the children, not perhaps in years, but in intellect." Marvin tells us to stand "on the avenue, and you will see thousands of these adult children stopping, promenading or loitering. They have no end to serve, they move with the throng merely because others by whom they are surrounded do the same. They are borne on by the force of example. If you closely examine the faces of these men and women who have spent years, perhaps life, on the avenue, you will see that the lines which usually indicate character are wanting and that the features . . . are blank and expressionless."

Marvin says, a more strongly marked class of the insane, are these "who seek comfort in the mirage of Spiritualism, the will-o-the-wisp of Mesmerism, or the Delusion of Transcendentalism." "The Press, the great engine of civilization, is often converted by their frenzy into an engine of folly. . . . turning backward the wheels of progress." They form societies, edit papers, and publicly proclaim their folly. What shall we do for these men and women, many of whom possess talent, genius, culture? "By virtue of their numbers we cannot confine them in asylums, nor can we subject them to medical surveillance."

Dr. Marvin believed in what Spencer calls Comte's superficial and untenable theory of three stages of intellectual progress; the mythological, the metaphysical, and the positive. The theory set forth that in examining the history of nations, of individuals, or of special sciences, it is found that speculation commences with supernatural, advances to metaphysical, and finally reposes in positive explanations." In connection with this theory, Marvin says, that this age is a very sad age," but, he says also, that it is a glorious age, . . . full of light from the ascending sun of science"; that "it lies between two great civilizations, . . . the age of metaphysics, which is practically dead," and that of the positive or scientific age, which he believes has not yet arrived. And what if this be true, does it promise general intelligence or more happiness and virtue? It has given more leisure, or induced more morality, nor even prevented an apparent retrograde movement, for as Bogelot says in his "Physics and Politics," it is "doubtful whether all the inventions and machines of mankind have yet lightened the day's labor of a human being." They have enabled more people to exist, but the people work just as hard, and are as mean and miserable as when there were fewer.

I think the moral condition of society is truly depicted in the article "Mokanna Unveiled," (TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 15th.). The writer agrees with Draper Frothingham, and other eminent Liberals in the doctrine of progressive improvement; and unites with them in vilifying the Dark Ages, and declaring that the people were sunk in the lowest ignorance and brutal superstitions. (Underwood, at the annual meeting of the Free Religious Associations, said that "These were ages of the grossest vice and licentiousness, and ages to which Lecky says the epithet "mean" is justly applicable. I hold, with Guizot and Mill, the contrary opinion, but Underwood says I am under a delusion.) The writer above mentioned says, that "in this God-blessed Republic, in this Nineteenth Century, the statistics of crime and vice are perfectly appalling." He supported his opinion by quoting from Ingersoll, McDonnell, Denton, etc., all of whom are believers in the progressive improvement of society. The following are some of his quotations from recent periodicals. "The records of the past have never presented a more fearful and corrupt state of society. "Crimes unprecedented in number and unequalled in atrocity fill every section of our country with horrors, exhibiting a hardened barbarity, in their details . . . only to be exceeded in the bosom of demons." And the Scientific American says, "It is admitted by all parties that crimes of the most outrageous, and unprecedented character abound throughout the country . . . to a degree wholly unparalleled." I believe that a worse character cannot be truly given to the "Dark Ages."

Yours truly, JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

J. H. CRANDALL, Langdon, Minn., writes: The more I read your paper, the better I like it, and I don't see how I could get along without it.

HORACE BALDWIN, Mt. Vernon, O., writes: I would rather have one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER than McCloskey's red cap. Still the work goes bravely on.

MRS. ELLA BIRGE WILSON, writes: We have been an old subscriber, in fact from the first, and would not lose a single number for the subscription price of the paper.

GEO. SHARFF, Logansport, Ind., writes: We like the T. S. for its plain talk, and will be glad to get it weekly. Free thought and mental liberty are gaining ground here.

JAMES LECLERC, Atlanta, Kan., writes: Accept my compliments for your Plimpton Hall Lecture. It gives a fair representation of all the gods which ignorant men have worshipped.

ISAAC SNYDER, M. D., Horton, Mich., writes: I have for over thirty years taken from $12 to $20 of papers and magazines a year, and I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the best among them all.

I. G. KENDALL, Southampton, Ill., writes: Please put my name down as a life subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I trust that you will be spared to do good in the world for years to come.

W. W. PALMER, Northport, Wis., writes: Save me one of the patent Book covers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have preserved all my numbers, and they are more valuable to me than those old Jewish legends called the Bible.

HENRY SAILOR, Lisbon, Ia., writes: Money is tight with me, but we would rather get along with a few less ruffles and ribbons than without your paper. Do not get discouraged in the good work you have begun. We all like to read it.

MRS. KATE PARKER, Anaheim, Cal., writes: I wish to compliment you on the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is replete with wise and witty, grave and funny, indisputable and inexhaustible matter; and I find nothing in it to condemn.

WM. D. BRISTER, Trenton Falls, N. Y., writes: I am delighted with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its language is bold, fearless, and, according to my ideas, truthful. I am glad it is soon to be published weekly, and my earnest wish is, that it may be well sustained.

JOS. CLEWS, San Bernardino, Cal., forwards a list of names and $10, and writes: That the Unknowable may ever increase your knowledge and wisdom for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER and humanity at large is the desire of a well wisher and life subscriber.

CHAS. L. ROBERTS, Yates City, Ill., sending in a list of eighteen subscribers, writes: I have the promise of other subscribers on the commencement of your new volume, and hope to do more for you. I will ask of you the privilege of still sending subscribers upon the old terms—$2 25 for sixteen months.

SAMUEL STRAUSS, Chicago, writes: I hope that the panic times will soon be over, and that with a better feeling generally people will be induced to do something for their mental benefit, and will read THE TRUTH SEEKER in preference to the Independent or similar stuff.

SARA VANSICKLE, Covington, Ind., writes: You see I comply with your request, and help answer your good prayer, and so will every genuine Freethinker, who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER. It certainly is the best paper published. I think Brother Altman a good Infidel.

ELMINA D. SLENKER, Snowville, Va., writes: Each number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is better than the preceding one. Thy own excellent paper on the "Gods," and thy "Prayer to the Devil," suits well. I am glad our generous friend, Mr. Altman, gave $50 for the circulation of the paper containing it.

E. B. DAVID, Vanville, Wis., writes: Liberalism is spreading rapidly in this part of the country. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing its work. Every copy that comes is seized with avidity, read, and handed around until some orthodox fool gets hold of it—and you know the result. Friend Bennett, God bless you—if there is any God.

C. T. MANNON, New Boston, Ill., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very well. Its fearless, outspoken, and respectful manner of dealing with the subjects of which it treats will cause it to be respected, even by opponents. We must stand for our opinions, and defend them like men entitled to equal rights.

P. A. O. HANKINS, Appleton, Tenn., writes: Many intelligent young men in this country are fond of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER; but proscription is a mighty power in the land, and men are ostracised for opinion's sake. To lose place and position, and be cast upon the cold charity of a Christian community is an alarming thought to them.

CHAS. L. ROBERTS, Yates City, Ill., writes: It is the expressed opinion of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER here that it is the best Liberal paper published, and that it is all the time improving. I shall want your book "The Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers," and quite a number of others say they shall want it.

FRED WELLINGTON, St. Charles, Mich., writes: I am well pleased with your paper—and some faults with it—less however, than with any other paper that deals with moral principles which has met my observation. Your lecture before the Liberal Club is excellent. With two very slight exceptions I endorse it.

MRS. JACOB MARTIN, Cairo, Ill., writes: I am glad THE TRUTH SEEKER is to be a weekly, and wish you success. I have as much good will toward Liberalism as Mr. Altman, but unfortunately, not as much money. If I had, you would find another $50 enclosed here for the cause. There are, thank goodness, a few persons able and willing to give largely; and we who cannot, can give what we are able and work all the more.

J. M. COOK, Lake Village, N. H., writes: Your lecture in the Aug. 15th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a stunner! The truth must be told, and all the Jewish Gods and devils cannot stop its spreading in our day. All the priests and popes and Beechers combined cannot hinder it.

C. B. TUCKER, Lyons, N. Y., writes: I could not well get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am very much pleased to know that you are going to issue it weekly. I sincerely hope you will succeed in your glorious and philanthropic mission to a blind and fanatical world. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best moral teacher I have ever known.

MARTIN CHRISTIANSEN, Green Bay, Wis., writes: It would do the Christians far more good to read the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER than to read the Pilgrim's Progress one hundred and one times. Brother Bennett, as long as the T. S. lives, be sure I shall remit and remain a living Liberal.

O. N. BANCROFT, Toms River, N. J., writes: I like your paper first-rate, because you publish what can be relied upon as truth. You have no holy humbug to bolster up. Your mathematics are correct—three times one make three with you, instead of one. Teach truth, let it hurt whoever it may. That should be the motto of all honest men.

JOHN PECK, Naples, N. Y., writes: Keep the fires of truth burning brightly. Let the black-coated gentry be seen in their true light. When the masses find out that God is capable of moving his own machinery, these privileged gentlemen will probably "step down and out."

JOHN T. FORD, Independence, Or., writes: I am pleased to learn that you are going to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a weekly publication after January next. I intend sending you before the year is out one dozen subscribers from this place in spite of the Orthodox and superstitious by which I am environed. Truth in the end will conquer; and THE TRUTH SEEKER must be made a success. I pronounce your paper the best Liberal sheet on the planet.

LEVI HEATH, Northport, Wis., writes: I have read your paper delivered before the Liberal Club, and think it the plainest and most outspoken paper I have ever read. I have also read the "Heathens of the Heath," and think it a very valuable work. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better and better every number, and watch the time of their coming. I will take a copy of your "World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers," though I hardly feel able to do so, but I think every Liberal should try and get one.

E. D. BLAKEMAN, Circleville, O., writes: I see you propose in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER to make it a weekly. Good! Go ahead, and may the angels' blessings be with you and it, and may it spread light and truth to the hungry souls of men. I like the way you manage the paper, and the liberal terms you offer. It is just what the times demand. The Liberal, Freethinking world cannot do without it. It is the means by which we can sound afar to others our beautiful ideas of truth, love and progress.

CHAS. STEPHENSON, Rock Island, Ill., writes: I think your proposed book will be a work that is greatly needed; though to be complete it will have to be so large that it will limit its circulation and thereby lessen its powers for good. No true Infidel I think would object to paying three or five dollars for such a work; but they are not the ones who need such knowledge the most. It is those who give credence to what they have been taught by Christian friends about the death-bed recantations of Infidels who are most in need of it.

F. J. KIEB, Newark, N. J., writes: I shall want the new book you intend to edit, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers." I am glad you are making an effort in that direction. Brother, you are doing a great and good work. Although you live in obscurity and labor in humble circumstances now, your reward will come some day, when this ignorant world will be more enlightened than it now is. I want you to send me the second volume as soon as finished.

LEVI WOOD, Galesburg, Mich., writes: I observe in your "Prayer" that you are determined to press forward in the good cause. I also observe that you do not call upon the Lord to answer your petitions, but upon the Liberals of the country—upon those who are not slaves to a hireling priesthood—to sustain you in your enterprise, not by wishing it success, but by substantial aid—greenbacks. Brothers and sisters, advocates of the Truth, shall this paper be sustained? Shall this sheet that is spreading common sense (a scarce article) be supported? Let us all reply by remitting promptly, and trying to extend its circulation.

E. K. HOSFORD, Edinburg, Ind., writes: I consider the last number—Aug. 15th—worth the whole subscription, and all that comes in future as a gratuity. Your subscribers here are all Spiritualists, but your paper pleases them. Your motto, "One world at a time," is a good one. I see no point for a quarrel between Materialists and advanced Spiritualists. We are glad THE TRUTH SEEKER is to become a weekly. Enroll me as a subscriber for your new book—"The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers." Success to you, Bro. Bennett. May the gods help you, if there are any! If they do not, help yourself, like a true philosopher, and the true and noble of earth's children will come to your aid.

ROLAND M. CASEY, Pendleton, S. C., writes: The last TRUTH SEEKER is at hand, and I am so well pleased with it that I must again give thanks, notwithstanding I wrote you only a few days ago. Your future plans for the paper really delight me, and I am sure will meet the approbation of every subscriber. The low price at which you propose to issue the weekly puts it within reach of nearly every individual who is friendly to our cause, and I am bold to say there is not a real Simon-pure Infidel in the land who will refuse to take it and pay for it. The best thing in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is your proposed enterprise of publishing the lives and deathbed incidents of noted Infidels. Since I became an Infidel I have wanted, and repeatedly inquired for, just such a work as you propose to issue. Send it by telegraph if you can. My son O. W. Casey, also wants one. We wish our names printed on the back of our books in large gilt letters. I trust every Infidel, every Spiritualist, and many of our honest Christian friends, will patronize the book.

A. SWEET, False Cape, Cal., writes: I want you to consider me a life subscriber. I never tire of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think it is getting better all the time. Your paper is doing a great work. The cause is progressing slow but steady. I take more interest in your paper than any paper that is published. My wife also likes it, and I want some tracts for my children—to counteract the false teachings which they are bound to hear, more or less. I think you are doing more good for the world than Christ did when he died to save sinners. One good, live worker is worth more than a dozen dead men in my estimation. I hope to see the time when our school-houses will not be infested two or three times every week with canting, psalm-singing sons of Babylon, and when people will not allow themselves to be taxed for the support of churches and hypocritical preachers.

WM. F. PORTER, 1916 Polethorp street, Philadelphia, writes: Having read 23 numbers of yours T. S.; I feel, in writing to you, as if I were addressing an old friend. I had never read any publication on free thought before, and on perusing your spicy little SEEKERS, it seemed as if the hoodwinks of ignorance had suddenly dropped from my eyes. In consequence of early education, the sword of Damocles seemed to be continually suspended over my head. I always seemed to be in dread of some impending punishment in the future life; but now thanks to your invaluable and instructive TRUTH SEEKER, all my apprehensions have vanished. O! I so wish your fearless little paper was in every household in the land. Keep on Brother Bennett, and you will come out right in the end. May you live to the age of Methuselah.

A. A. CLARK, Evening Shade, Ark., writes: Although I hold to views entirely antagonistic to those you have expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning the Deity, still I am thoroughly convinced that you are doing a great deal in the cause of intellectual liberty, and I will with pleasure do all in my power toward extending the influence of your paper. I hope you will continue to give to your readers articles from the pens of Messrs. Ingersoll and Underwood. Col. Ingersoll's Oration on Thomas Paine I consider as a splendid and unsurpassed tribute to the memory of one of the noblest of men; and the number of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing that Oration is alone worth the subscription price of your paper. I think that your idea about inserting a family record in your new book is a good one. It will have the effect to perpetuate the book in Liberal families. This book will furnish our boys and girls with plenty of evidence by which they can "corner the parson" when that worthy makes his usual attack on our progenitors in the field of free thought. I cannot close without congratulating you upon the fact that THE TRUTH SEEKER is to become a weekly.

A. ARMSTRONG, Meadville, Pa., writes: I am glad you have concluded to issue THE TRUTH SEEKER weekly. I promise you at least two new subscribers. If I fail to find that number who will take it and pay for it, I will make New Years' presents of two copies to make good my promise. There are but few friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER who are not able to add at least one new subscriber to your list, and I trust that every one who is taking your valuable paper this year will deem it their duty to make some such promise, and exceed their promise, to the astonishment of the editor. Volume three of THE TRUTH SEEKER would be a nice New Years' present to bestow on a friend, where one is not able to make presents of a higher price (I will not say value). My acquaintance with it has not been long, but I would not now exchange it for any paper I know of. I find many who are willing to receive the paper from me that have not the courage to become regular subscribers. I need not mention the reason. There is not near the number of Christian believers as the numerous God-houses indicate. True, Infidels are scarce, but hypocrites are numerous. You may count me a subscriber for your book, the "World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers."

HENRY WILBUR, Vineland, New Jersey, writes: I have lately been going to and fro on the earth—like the old adversary—and have had an opportunity of taking notice of the growth of ideas, and I am forced to believe that, by virtue of the inherent principle of progress which pervades all through nature, the old blood and thunder doctrines, together with their accompanying superstitions, are gradually passing away. It requires more brains than the average preacher of the day possesses to make young Americans believe the unmathematical proposition that three persons occupy the same place at the same time; or that, according to orthodox figuring, three are one, or one three. There is a very palpable falling off from the Christian Church all over the country, and Talmage may well inquire, "Inasmuch as there are four deaths to every two conversions in the Church, how long will it take the race to get to heaven?" Of course there are some things in THE TRUTH SEEKER which I do not endorse; but I reflect that there are manifold phases of liberal thought to please, and if the different elements of liberalism were more united, our influence might be much greater, and the task of enlightening the world much easier.

SALLIE J. MINER, Angola, Ind., writes: I am deeply interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER, more so than in any paper I have ever read. I have taken the Woodhull Weekly from the time it started. Mrs. W. has been a fearless advocate of free thought, free speech, and freedom for every individual to act independent of all our old time-worn institutions, but she has gone back to the antique folly of trying to make the Bible something more than other books, and to make it support what she herself advocates. My interest in her paper is gone. THE TRUTH SEEKER is grand! Looking to Science and all the growing elements of Liberalism for support, it appears to me that it can never fail to interest all intelligent people of the present time. I received my first impressions of God and religion from the Shakers. They took me when eight years old and I lived with them nine years. I loved them and believed in all their doctrines, yet I was so situated that I could not remain with them. When I decided to leave them I sincerely believed I was leaving all that was good, and rebelled against God and his requirements. I prayed for death and annihilation. I could not see a bright spot, either in the present or the future, at that time, and for several years I lived with secret sorrow in my heart at the imaginary wrongs of my life, and with a secret prayer for annihilation as the only escape from a terrible hell and an offended God. For the last twenty years I have been gradually growing out of my superstitious and foolish ideas of God. I now love such broad good, and grand ideas as THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates. I wonder how sensible people can entertain such narrow ideas of God as religionists do. I am astonished when I think how long my own soul was bound in those worn than iron bands of superstition and ignorance. But I am free at last, and I think this a beautiful world in which we live. I offer up no prayers to be delivered from it or the things therein. Ignorance is man's greatest enemy, and the cause of all his unhappiness. So, Bro. Bennett, persevere in the good work you are engaged in—that of seeking the truth and teaching it to your fellow-men. As there is much written by some religionists in relation to the last enemy—Death—being destroyed, and a time coming when our bodies will not see corruption, I would like to see an article from your pen upon that subject. Common sense views of life and death are what the world needs. I am so well pleased with your paper that I could not refrain from expressing my feelings to you (though a stranger), and also a little of my past experience, thinking it might encourage you to go on with the good work you have undertaken—of dispelling the clouds of ignorance and superstition.

SECOND EDITION.

Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism.

BY N. B. WOLFE, M.D.

The constant and regular demand for this book exhausted the first edition some months ago, although a very large edition was worked off. For the second edition the plates have been carefully revised under the immediate supervision of the author. The publishers have had the paper made expressly for the second edition and the united efforts of the Author and Publishers have placed on sale a very fine and attractive appearing book. Although no expense has been deemed too great that would add to the perfection of the book; the price has been reduced one-fifth.

"STARTLING FACTS IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM" embodies some of the most remarkable and wonderful facts, ever published, and of the deepest interest to all. The truth of the history herein set forth in such graphic and absorbing style, is clearly established by the most indubitable evidence. Among the witnesses are some of the prominent members of the press, and others equally well known.

The book is a large 12 mo., 543 pp. Bound in extra heavy cloth, illuminated with four elegant steel portraits and numerous fine wood engravings.

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

AND

CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALIST

THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Being a synopsis of the investigations of spirit intercourse by an Episcopal Bishop, three ministers, five doctors and others at Memphis, Tenn., in 1855; also, the opinion of many eminent divines, living and dead, on the subject, and communications received from a number of persons recently.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "CLOCK STRUCK ONE" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century. A man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This anxiety is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference of which the author is a member in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "CLOCK STRUCK ONE."

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

Or A TRUE HISTORY OF THE MAN CALLED JESUS CHRIST

EMBRACING

His parentage, his youth, his original doctrines and works, his career as a public teacher and physician of the people. Also, the nature of the great conspiracy against him; with all the incidents of his tragical death, given on spiritual authority, from spirits who were contemporary mortals with Jesus while on the earth.

By PAUL and JUDAS, through ALEXANDER SMYTH, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the great fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors, and we shall print a large edition to enable us to supply standing orders and all new demands. 12mo., 356 pages, cloth bound.

Price, $1 50.

New Gospel of Health:

AN EFFORT TO TEACH PEOPLE

The Principles of Vital Magnetism;

OR,

How to replenish the Springs of Life without Drugs or Stimulants.

BY ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute; Inventor of the "Pulmometer, or Lung Tester;" Author of a "Treatise on the Curability of Pulmonary Consumption by Inhalation of Cold Medicated Vapors, Natural Hygiene," etc.

Its aim is to set before the general public the principles of vital magnetism, whereby the springs of life may be replenished without the use of drugs or stimulants. The subject matter is divided into thirty-eight sections, and purports to come from physicians who, ranking among the highest when in earth-life, have now made the attempt from the spirit sphere to communicate through an earthly medium knowledge which shall be even more powerful for good among the masses than their former labors in mortal. The ground gone over by these various contributors is wide and varied, and the hygienic hints given for self-cure are worth many times the cost of the volume.

The book is illustrated with over 120 engravings, among them being a steel plate likeness of Dr. Stone. Also a magnificent steel plate of engraving of the Goddess Hygiea.

519 pages, cloth, $2.50, postage 35 cents; paper covers, $1.25, postage 23 cents.

A New Work by Dr. Hall.

How to Live Long;

OR,

HEALTH, MAXIMS, PHYSICAL, MENTAL AND MORAL. By W. W. HALL, A.M., M.D., author of "Health by Good Living," "Bronchitis and Kindred Diseases," "Health at Home," "Sleep," "Coughs and Colds, etc.,

In his preface to this new volume the author says:

"To live long, is to live well, by eating and drinking abundantly of all the good things of this life; in their season, in their freshness, in their perfection; not only of the fruits of the orchard, the vegetables of the garden, and the grains of the field, but of the birds of the air, the fish of the sea, and the cattle upon a thousand hills; by gathering about us the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life; by cultivating the higher tastes of our nature; by cherishing the affections and by the promotion of all that innocently enlivens, exhilarates, delights, and enraptures,

"How to do these things in such a way as to preserve and promote the highest health and thus double their value, is the object of this book. The aim is to make the lessons short, concise, specific, and to the point, in the fewest possible words, to compel the reading of them and so impress them on the mind by fact and warning and incident and example and anecdote, that they cannot be forgotten in a life-time.

"It is hoped that some who would not spend the time to hear a lecture or read a book may be enticed to peruse a paragraph now and then in reference to the care of the body, which, in being put into practice, may have an important bearing in the prolongation of life: thus teaching the reader 'How To Live Long.'"

The following are a few random maxims from the Doctor's book:

"In warm weather, the longer you can put off drinking water in the forenoon, the better you will feel at night."

"Acids always injure the teeth, pure sweets never do."

"The most valuable part of the common potato is immediately under the outside skin, which is peeled off and thrown to the pigs; if baked or boiled and only the very outside skin is peeled off, all the nutriment is saved."

"We should go to sleep on the right side, then the food descends through the outlet of the stomach by gravity; otherwise, stomach power is wasted in drawing it up, as from the bottom of a well; after the first sleep, let the body take care of its own position."

"Persons are not very sick who want to be read to."

"If thrown into the water and the strength is failing, turn on the back with only the nose and toes out of the water, hands downward and clasped. This should be practiced while learning to swim, as a means of resting from great fatigue in swimming."

PRESS COMMENTS.

"One of the sharpest, most satirical poems ever brought before the American public. Logical, witty, and mirth-provoking. The subject of the rhymes is the great Woodhull-Tilton-Beecher scandal."

A rough, wide-awake Yankee, by the name of "Jonathan," a kind of a John Hay of a fellow, hauls all the characters over the coals in a sensible manner. There is more stern logic in his off-hand hits, than is often found in such rough-clad phraseology. The one who reads this pamphlet will never regret the investment."

"Davis' new poem is in his best vein. Racy, trenchant, suggestive, it will help people to a knowledge of the truth of the Beecher scandal, and more sensible views regarding love and marriage."—The Word, Princeton.

"The great mogul of Christianity. Henry Ward Beecher, is very artistically shown up in the 'Drama of Deceit.'"—Philomathean, San Francisco.

"There are jewels of thought in this work that deserve a better sitting."—Sun, N. Y.

A NEW AND VALUABLE WORK.

Christianity and the Bible

AGAINST

Philosophy and Science.

DR. J. PILKINGTON, of California, has written a striking Pamphlet with the above title. A perusal of its mass of facts will better post and fortify the Liberal mind as to ecclesiastical pretensions, and the persecutions of the Church in all ages, than a more bulky and ambitious work. Liberal friend, no flatter word can be selected to hand to your bigoted neighbor of the Church than this instructive pamphlet. Anxious to spread the truth, we have reduced the price of this work, (which is elegantly printed in clear type, on fine white paper,) to twenty cents, postage 2 cents.

Odds and Ends.

A FLOURISHING business—Ornamental penmanship.

A MAN in Cincinnati advertising for a situation, says: "Work not so much an object as good wages."

ALLUDING to chignons, Mrs. Clever said: "A girl seems all head." "Yes, till you talk to her," replied Mr. Clever.

"IDIOT!" exclaimed a lady, coming out of the theatre one evening, as a gentleman accidentally stepped on her trailing skirt. "Which of us?" blandly asked the man.

"My dear," said a rural wife to her husband on his return from London, "what was the sweetest thing you saw in bonnets in the town?" "The ladies' faces, my love."

"WHICH is the worst, my son, to hurt your own finger or another's feelings?" "Why, the feelings, of course." "And why my son?" "'Cause you can't wrap a rag round 'um."

A NEVADA man, who had seven homely daughters, got a newspaper to insert a hint that he had seven kegs filled with gold in his cellar, and every girl was married in five months.

In a country church-yard we find the following epitaph: "Here lies the body of James Robinson, and Ruth, his wife." And underneath, this text: "Their warfare is accomplished."

An Iowa minister was recently killed by lightning while standing on the banks of a murmuring stream and endeavoring to convince some bad boys that bathing on a Sunday was a sin. An awful warning.

SMYTHE was telling some friends about a wonderful parrot. "Why," said he, "that parrot cries 'Stop thief' so naturally that every time I hear it I always stop. Now, hang it, what are you all laughing at?"

"MR. SNIFFKIN," said Mrs. S., "don't you think marriage is a means of grace?" "Well," growled Sniffkins, "I suppose that anything is a means of grace which breaks down pride and leads to repentance."

A LUNATIC in Bedlam was asked how he came there. He answered: "By a dispute." "What dispute?" The Bedlamite replied: "The world said I was mad; I said the world was mad, and they outwitted me."

DANIEL FENDER concluded a letter, asking Mary to be his, thus: "And should you say 'yes,' dear Mary, I will ever and faithfully be your D. Fender." Daniel thought that was neat, and so did Mary. They have been happy.

An Alabama orator, in a recent speech, said: "'Here I intended to close, but a new thought comes rushing like a mighty comet through the heaven of mind, scattering systems in its paths'—and he scattered his audience by going on.

A MAN having an account against a distant merchant sent a letter of inquiry to a banker in the town where the debtor lived, and received the following reply: "He is dead, but that doesn't make any difference, as he pays just as well as ever he did."

THE MAN WITH THE COON SKIN.—He halted in front of a grocery store and drawing from under his coat a small parcel tied around with a string, he inquired of the grocer, who sat by the door, "How's trade?"

"Pretty fair for hot weather," was the answer.

"Are you up to bargains?" continued the stranger, as he untied the parcel and took out a coon skin—a cook skin which seemed to have been kicked about the house ever since the close of the war.

"Humph!" sneered the grocer, as he contemptuously regarded the old skin.

"You may 'humph!' and 'humph!' and 'humph!' all you want to!" exclaimed the stranger in a loud voice, "but if you want a coon skin to sell again this is the article!"

"I don't think I want to invest."

"You don't? Great heavens! but I took you for a man of talent and enterprise!"

"No one ever buys coon skins or furs in the summer," said the grocer.

"I know it's a little late in the season, and therefore I'm willing to throw off something. I shouldn't have the face to ask over fifty cents for this 'ere coon skin."

"I shouldn't want to pay that price," replied the grocer.

"You wouldn't? Merciful stars! But is it possible that you would take bread from the mouths of my starving children, my innocent darlings, who don't know a coon skin from a cow hide?"

The grocer was silent, and the stranger smoothed the brindled hair with his right hand and continued:

"I will go before any court in the land and take a solemn oath that this is one of the best coon skins offered in this market for the last fifteen years. Observe the variegated colors! Behold the tender softness! Just put your hand on this coon skin, mister!"

"I don't think I want to buy any furs before November," quietly replied the grocer.

"You don't? Is it possible that you will deliberately let this great bargain slip through your fingers? No! I cannot believe it! Dozens of grocers in this town want this coon skin; want it so that they can't keep still; but I was recommended to come to you, and I am here."

"It isn't a prime skin," said the grocer, as he glanced at the flesh side a second time.

"It ain't? Here, mister, shoot me! Draw your revolver and send a bullet in here, right through my quivering heart!"

He dropped the coon skin and held his coat and vest open, but as the grocer didn't shoot he presently picked up his merchandise, and continued in a sad voice:

"Mister, do I look like a pirate, or a robber, or a liar? Do you suppose I'd go and tell you a deliberate lie, and peril my chances of ever reaching heaven, for the sake of selling you this coon skin?"

"No, I suppose not," replied the grocer, leaning back in his chair.

"Ah, no. I wouldn't. I ain't purty, nor I don't wear many store clothes on my person, but I'm honest—yes, as honest as the day is long. If I should so far forget my early training as to tell you a lie about this coon skin, I never could enjoy another night's rest—never!"

"Well, I guess I don't want it," said the grocer.

"Heavens! but is it possible that you will let me return to my loving wife and fond children without bread to appease their hunger? Will you deliberately and willfully sit there and see me tie this coon skin up and walk away, when I am offering it to you at one-half its market value?"

"You can perhaps sell it elsewhere."

"I know I can. I know a dozen men who want it, but they are not men of your reputation. When you hand me fifty cents I know it is the genuine scrip, and I go away satisfied. The others might pass counterfeit money on me, and I might be arrested and jailed, and my family be exposed to the scorn of this cold world."

"I don't want the coon skin," said the grocer, "but if your family are suffering for the want of food, I'll give you fifteen cents for it, and throw it back in the loft."

"Fif—fifteen—fifteen cents!" exclaimed the stranger, dropping the fur and springing off the step. "Now let the angels look down and weep! Let that bright sun be obscured by clouds blacker than midnight rolled in tar! If life has come to this, let me die to once!"

The grocer picked up a newspaper, and the stranger waited two or three minutes, sighed heavily, and then handed out the skin, and sadly said:

"Take it, and give me the paltry pittance! I am going home to die in the bosom of my family! I'll gather them around me once more, take a last farewell, and then I'll drop into the turbid river, and be seen no more!"

The money was handed him, and he passed down the street two blocks, turned to the left, and as he kicked open the blind door of a saloon, he said to the barkeeper:

"Juleps for one, and fill the glass chock up!"

THE Pope has conferred upon Cardinal McCloskey the ring and the title of Santa Maria Sopra-Minerva. Is that considered a fair "return for the $20,000 in gold which the

the red cap thrown in!

SEVERAL towns on the Gulf coast in Texas suffered terribly in the late gale and high water. Indianola lost three hundred houses and nearly 400 lives. Velasco, another town, was entirely destroyed. Other places also suffered very severely. Was this the work of "Providence," or did it result from natural causes? Liberal donations for the sufferers are being made up in Northern cities.

GUILT AND INNOCENCE—THE DIFFERENCE.—Beecher has again virtually confessed his guilt by eagerly agreeing to the proposition made by the District Attorney to enter a nolle prosequi in the case of Henry Ward Beecher agt.
Francis D. Moulton for libel. Moulton, on the contrary, promptly refuses to allow his accuser "to escape the penalties of a perjured prosecution," and peremptorily demands a trial.—Kentucky Yeoman.

THE REV. MR. BAKER, a favorite preacher in a pleasant village in Pennsylvania, came to grief a short time ago by making Brooklyn overtures to a sister of the Church, who failing to see the matter in the same light he did, handed him over to the Church authorities for trial. He refused to be tried, and in preference handed in his license and stepped down and out. Some of the sisters insist it is a great pity, for he was "a confounded good preacher."

THE PLYMOUTH PULPIT.—The publication of the Plymouth Pulpit has been discontinued.—Independent.

Is not the above paragraph sarcastic? The discontinuation of the Plymouth Pulpit is another evidence that the pastor's teachings are not in active demand just now, and that the doubling process is in order. In time it may be found advantageous to stop the publication of the Christian Union and consolidate with Plymouth Church, or have the pastor divide the morning hour each Sunday service by a sermon and an editorial. H. B. M.

THEODORE TILTON has commenced his lecture campaign. Already three hundred applications have been filed for his services, but he will not lecture more than two hundred nights, and if his health continues good, possibly two hundred and twenty-five nights. Mr. Tilton does not expect, even in the most remote way, to speak of the scandal, and his agents say that he will not allow his intimate friends to broach the subject. Mr. Tilton receives $100 a night for his lecture, and more in the larger cities. He is to speak every night except Sundays and on Christmas until the first of June.

The means of boring through mountains have been greatly perfected of late years. The boring of the Mount Cenis tunnel advanced at the rate of four yards a day; that of the St. Gothard now goes on at about ten yards daily, and will be completed, according to contract, by the 23d of August, 1880. The total length of the St. Gothard tunnel will be 15,044 yards.

IMITATING PLYMOUTH CHURCH.—Not long ago the Rev.
C. A. Graeber, of the German Lutheran church of Meriden, Conn., was charged with improper conduct with a girl who lived in his house, and the church committee requested him to resign. He protested his innocence, and a meeting of the parish was held, at which he was reinstated. The charges were made by three men who claim to have been witnesses of the improper proceedings. Since the first meeting of the parish another has been held, and the pastor made as many protestations of innocence as he did at the first, but, strange to say, neither of the three witnesses has been called to give an account of the affair he saw, although all were present at one of the meetings. Some of this pastor's flock are dissatisfied with the previous so-called investigation, and have now determined that the pastor shall be arraigned before his parish for the third time, and a searching investigation of the charges made; in fact, this has been ordered by the Head Synod at St. Louis.—New Haven Palladium.

MOODY AND SANKEY are now said to be pretty well recuperated, and that the great work of getting up a revival and "leading souls to Jesus," will soon commence in this city. The influence they wield is probably mainly due to the excellent singing of Sankey and George C. Weeks, who accompanies them. Few things work upon the imagination and the feelings like music. This we have witnessed in temperance meetings, political campaigns, etc. While Moody prays, calls upon Jesus and depicts in the most vivid manner he is capable of, the terrors and torments of the damned, Sankey and Weeks come in with their choruses and touching appeals, with their inimitable musical powers, and it often proves to much for dis-tempered minds, and they momentarily yield and imagine they throw themselves into the arms of Jesus. We presume the work of the revival will soon be in operation here. If these men can only get up a revival of common honesty and integrity, that it may pervade our entire community, it will be of immense value. If men and women can be induced to discard hypocrisy, dishonesty and villainy, and embrace, in their place, industry, frugality, honesty, sobriety and common sense, it will be the most valuable revival our country can have.

FATHER'S BEWARE.—A patron in a Western State who had the misfortune a few years ago to lose his companion, writes us a little bit of his experience. Having three children, he has found it necessary to employ a housekeeper; in fact he has had several in all. In the number he has employed he found some to give good satisfaction, and others were indifferent. Four of the number had married well. When the last one married he had to look for another. He saw an advertisement of a "good Christian woman," strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Dubuque, who wished a home in a pious family. He was not a "pious" man, but he thought he would send for the Christian woman. She soon became attached to the children and taught them the Catechism, prayers, &c.
He soon had occasion to notice that she was spending the most time and attention with his oldest child, a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age, and by watching her movements he discovered she was teaching the boy lessons not in the Catechism. She had said she was "going to make a man of him," and she was absolutely hurrying the matter beyond his years. The father strongly protested against the lessons she was imparting to his boy and sent her away, and wishes to warn fathers against employing pious housekeepers recommended by Young Men's Christian Associations. This woman after her departure wrote several love letters to the boy and tried to induce him to leave his home and go with her. Too much piety, altogether.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

AXIOMATIC, OR SELF-EVIDENT TRUTH.

It is an incontrovertible fact that all human beings are introduced into the present state of existence in a condition of entire ignorance, and all that they ever know they are obliged to learn. By means of the senses, which are the windows of the mind, we become acquainted with ourselves and with external nature around us, and all its varied phenomena. Without sensation there could be no consciousness; without consciousness no intelligence, and without intelligence the mind would be a blank. By observation and experience we acquire a knowledge of facts as they exist in nature. These facts we make the basis of what we call reasoning. We can reason only from what we know or think we know. Reasoning consists in deducing inferences from real or supposed facts. If the premises from which we reason are correct, and our reasoning is correct, the conclusion to which we arrive will be correct. On the other hand, if our premises are false, or if our reasoning is false, the conclusion will also be false. It must not be forgotten that we can reason correctly from false premises, but in all such cases the conclusion will be as false as the premises themselves. It is highly important, therefore, that in all our reasonings we be quite sure that our premises are correct. The conclusions to which we arrive by the process of reasoning constitute our opinions, as distinguished from what we know by the evidence of our senses.

Now truth may be classified under three heads: 1. Physical truth; 2. Intellectual truth; 3. Moral truth. The first consists of facts as they exist in nature, and must be verified by the testimony of the senses. The second consists of opinions which must be sanctioned by sound logical reasoning. The third consists of our opinions in regard to our obligations and duties toward our fellow-men, and must be tested by our sense of right and justice, and by their practical utility in the world.

Nature, then, is the great standard of truth, and to her teachings must be made the ultimate appeal. Our understanding of her teachings may be imperfect; our interpretation of her lessons may be erroneous, but Nature never lies, she makes no mistakes, commits no errors, is guilty of no blunders. Every man must interpret her as best he can. Truth is the natural food of the mind, as bread is of the body. All truth necessary for man to know, is adapted to his capacities and powers. Truth must be its own witness. It must approve itself to our senses, our reason and our moral sense.

When the mind has attained sufficient maturity, it readily distinguishes truth from error, just as we learn to distinguish food that is wholesome from that which is unwholesome. As the minds of men are in different stages of development, all cannot see alike, and hence there are, and must be, different opinions among them. But notwithstanding the great diversity of human beliefs, there are certain cardinal principles which will be accepted as true by all intelligent men. These doctrines are so obviously true that no argument is needed to sustain them. The simple statement of them in an intelligible form is sufficient to carry conviction to every unbiased mind. These truths we call axiomatic or self-evident, and they constitute, perhaps, the best test to apply to every dogma or proposition which may be presented for our consideration.

We will now make a statement of some of these self-evident truths, and point out the manner of their application.

1. The whole of a thing is greater than a part of it.
2. Nothing can be, and not be, at the same instant.
3. Two solid substances cannot occupy the same space at the same instant of time.
4. No created being can be a hundred years old the moment he begins to exist.
5. No created being can be equal to his creator.
6. No truth can contradict any other truth.
7. Two contradictory statements cannot both be true.
8. A finite mind cannot comprehend the infinite.
9. Infinite attributes are uncommunicable.
10. Under the government of a being who is all-wise, all-powerful and all-good, absolute evil cannot possibly exist.
11. An absolutely good being cannot create an absolutely bad being.
12. Only one being possessed of infinite attributes can exist in the Universe.
13. God cannot create a totally depraved being.
14. A superior being who creates an inferior, knowing that he will be cursed by his existence, is not good to that being.
15. A law to which there is annexed a penalty which may be averted, can have no restraining influence over viciously inclined men.

16. A law having a penalty which, if inflicted, will defeat the object of the law, is not a wise law.

17. There can be no end to that which is endless.

18. To inflict punishment upon an innocent person, which is due only to the guilty, is a double act of gross outrage upon every principle of justice.

19. No being can incur guilt or punishment for acting in accordance with the laws of his own nature.

20. The number one cannot be made to express more than one.

21. The number three cannot be made to express less than three.

22. No man is under any obligation to believe what appears to him to contradict his reason or sense of right and justice.

23. No incredible statement is to be believed, unless it is sustained by an amount of evidence, which would make it more unreasonable to reject the evidence than it would be to accept the statement.

24. The remission of the penalty of a law presupposes or implies that the penalty is not just and wise.

We propose now to apply the above truths as a test to some of the dogmas of popular Christianity. We shall see that they crash through the creeds and commandments of men, scattering them like leaves before a mighty wind. These dogmas, when put in the form of propositions, may be stated as follows:

1. There exists a personal being called the Devil, a creature of God, all of whose attributes are positively evil, unmixed with the least particle of good. Compare this with truth No. 11.

2. Mankind are born into the world with totally corrupt and depraved natures, and all their inclinations are to evil, and only evil, and that continually. Compare with truths Nos. 13 and 19.

3. God is one, but nevertheless exists in three persons, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and yet there are not three persons, but one person. Compare with truths Nos. 20 and 21.

4. Jesus Christ, although a creature of God, (see Rev. iii. 14.) yet possessed all the attributes of Divinity. Compare with truths Nos. 9 and 12.

5. Evil is positive and absolute, inasmuch as it is destined to reign over millions of human beings forever, thereby rendering their existence a curse instead of a blessing. Compare with truths Nos. 10 and 14.

6. The penalty of God's law, after it has been incurred by the transgressor, may be averted by timely repentance. Compare with truths Nos. 15 and 24.

7. The penalty of God's law, if inflicted on the violator of it, will place him in a condition that will forever render it impossible for him to obey the law. Compare with truth No. 16.

8. The penalty of God's law is endless punishment, and yet Christ endured the penalty in his sufferings and death upon the cross. Compare with truth No. 17.

9. The penalty of God's law, which had been incurred by all mankind, was inflicted on Jesus Christ, who had violated no law, incurred no penalty, and was an entirely innocent person. Compare with truth No. 18.

10. There are certain theological and religious doctrines which we are required to believe, whether they appear to us reasonable or not, and for not believing them we incur the penalty of endless damnation. Compare with truth No. 22.

11. The Bible contains statements in relation to occurrences and events which, if the same were made at the present day, we would not believe even on the authority of living witnesses, and yet we are requested to believe these statements on the authority of men who lived and wrote long after the events are said to have happened, men who could not have been eye-witnesses of what they relate, and of whose competency as witnesses, and reputation for truth and veracity we know nothing. Compare with truth No. 23.

Now as truth is always consistent with itself, and as the above eleven propositions directly contradict the correspondingly numbered propositions in the list of self-evident truths, it follows that one or the other must be false. Which it is, the reader can judge.

CONCLUSION.

Of what has been said in the foregoing pages, this is the sum. From the earliest dawn of intelligence and religion among men, truth and error, fact and fiction, reason and superstition have been strangely commingled. He who lends a helping hand in the work of sifting the wheat from the chaff, is a public benefactor. Wherever ignorance prevails, superstition abounds; wherever reason predominates superstition dies. First of all it is necessary to assert and maintain the supremacy and authority of pure reason over all authority which is opposed to reason. No one thing has served more to perpetuate ignorance and superstition than the idea that the Supreme Ruler of the Universe interferes in an exceptional manner with the affairs of mankind, and that he has given them an infallible revelation in book form of his will and purpose concerning them. This idea was born of ignorance, and has been kept in being by ignorance and imposture. So long as men honestly believe that they have a creed sanctioned by the authority of God, and that belief in it is essential to the welfare of man and society in this world, and indispensable to secure his happiness in eternity, so long, of necessity, there must be bigots and persecutors in the world. And in proportion as this idea prevails among the masses of men, they must be mental and moral slaves, the dupes of imposition, the victims of a miserable superstition. The chain of evidence by which it is claimed that the Bible is in a special and exceptional sense the "Word of God," has only to be critically examined to discover that it is only a rope of sand. The internal evidence is, if possible, still worse. It bears evident marks of a human origin. Like everything else in nature, or in art, it may be made the instrument of good or evil. It is valuable only in proportion to the amount of truth that it contains. The errors contained in it are more pernicious than if found anywhere else, because they are attributed to God, and men are taught to believe that they must be accepted because God spoke them. There is no proof that God ever spoke to any man in an audible voice, that he ever exhibited himself in proper person, nor that he ever interpolated into the system of Nature a single miracle, nor that he ever revealed himself in any other way than through the medium of the human faculties.

The idea of the existence of a semi-omnipotent evil spirit, called the Devil, who is a rival of God in the government of the world, and who is constantly thwarting him in his designs and defeating his purposes, is a monstrous conception of a weak, ignorant and debased mind. God could not create such a being for want of material out of which to construct him. He could not create himself for the same reason. The only devil that men need to guard themselves against is the one each man carries around with him in his own bosom. A strict watch over that will insure us against all harm from any devil that exists in the Universe.

The various theologies in the world are made up of the opinions of men about religion. They are the systematized thoughts of men on that important and interesting subject. Religion is one thing, the thoughts of men about religion are another and sometimes a very different thing. When these theologies are made a substitute for religion, they inflict a double curse upon mankind. First, by displacing religion, and second by establishing a fraud and an imposition. Hence it is that the popular religion of the day in its organized form is a sham. It sets up a false standard of respectability, virtue and morality. It attaches more importance to belief than to practice; to faith than to character and life. The man who is punctilious in performing the outward rites and ceremonies of religion, although an extortioner or a defaulter, or proud, haughty, vain, morose, selfish and exclusive, is thought to be more religious and more in favor with God than the man who disregards the ceremonies and professions, but is nevertheless kind, generous, benevolent and good. This form of religion is for the most part wholly artificial and uncongenial with the nature of man. Not only is this fact admitted by its advocates, when they insist that it can neither be understood nor embraced by man until he experiences a change of nature, but the fact that, notwithstanding the vast and ponderous machinery which is employed in its propagation, its adherents in this country, at least, constitute a minority of the people, proves that it is artificial rather than natural. When we consider the hundreds of thousands of clergymen and missionaries who are engaged in its propagation, the vast sums of money employed for the same purpose, the millions of Bibles that have been circulated all over the world, the trillions of tracts, papers, sermons, periodicals and books that have been published in its interest, the wonder is, not that the converts are so many, but that they are so few. And the fact that they are so few cannot be accounted for only by the truth that, as a whole, the system is at war with the nature of man. That it is unsatisfactory to its adherents, is evinced by the fact that so many of them tell us that if they believed there was no endless punishment, they would "take their fill of sin in this world" without regard to God or the interests of humanity. And yet they profess to be par excellence, the lovers of God and man. With all such persons religion is a cross, a burden, a mere make-shift to get into heaven, a choice between two evils. It is a terrible thing to be religious, but it is better to be so than it is to go to hell. How much more manly, and noble and truthful is the sentiment of the true religionist. If there were no God, no heaven, no hell, no future state of existence, he would love and practice virtue for its own sake, and for the joy and peace it imparts to the soul. What a mistake it is to suppose that it is necessary to make ourselves miserable on earth in order to be happy in heaven.

The Priesthood is a human institution. It was founded on the idea that God is angry with his creatures, and that his wrath can be propitiated and his favor secured by offerings of presents, by sacrifices of fruits and animals, and by the performance of pompous and imposing rites and ceremonies. Hence the supposed necessity of setting apart a class of men to do this work. The institution is based on a falsehood. The removal of the error will cause the superstition to topple to the ground. Originally the priestly and kingly offices were united in the same man. Priestcraft and kingcraft have been mutual helps to each other. Together they have inflicted untold woes upon the children of men, by depriving them of their inalienable rights, and by imposing upon them burdens "which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear."

Undoubtedly the Priesthood, like all the other learned professions, is composed of both good and bad men. But on the score of merit, it cannot justly claim any superiority over the others. Doubtless the Clergy are no better, nor any worse than the average of men, only so far as the false position which they occupy makes them so. With them the business of theological and religious teaching is a profession and a means of obtaining a livelihood. Before they enter upon their work, they must, before God and man, make solemn professions of faith in a certain creed to which they are expected to adhere and defend during life. On their doing this, their living depends. They have a pecuniary interest at stake. The creed must be maintained, missionary work must be done, contributions must be raised, revival excitements must be gotten up, converts must be made, for all this brings grist to their mill. They are conservative in their tendencies, opposed to all innovation, tenacious and bigoted in their opinions and blind to all newly-discovered truth. They can seldom see the word truth, because, with them, it is covered by a dollar. Their occupation leads them into the practice of conscious or unconscious hypocrisy. They assume a character before the people that they by no means maintain in their families, or when in company with each other. However grave, sanctimonious and circumspect they may appear in public, when assembled in company by themselves, they are the most jolly of men. They can then crack their jokes, tell funny stories, relate smutty anecdotes and indulge in low gossip to an extent unequaled by any except professional libertines. They denounce human selfishness, and are of all men the most selfish; declaim against avarice, and are mercenary and avaricious; preach against pride, fashion and love of the world, and yet are as proud, as servile imitators of fashion, and manifest as much of the love of the world as other men. They insist on the necessity of self-denial, but think themselves entitled to the most comfortable places, the best bits, the choicest dainties, the lion's share of all the good things of life. They profess to be awfully concerned and anxious for the welfare of poor sinners, but their sleek, smooth, well-to-do appearance gives no indication of excessive anxiety. They claim that men in their natural state are totally depraved, and yet, in this country, at least, they profess to believe in a free government, founded on the principle that the people have a right to govern themselves, an inconsistency so glaring that it makes us suspicious of their sincerity.

Obituary.

BY M. P. ROSECRANS.

ADAM.—Died just outside of a garden called Eden, our father, Adam; aged nearly a thousand years. He was universally respected by all who knew him. He was followed to the grave by a large procession of children, whose ages might have been counted from the tiny infant up to hundreds of years.

Yes dear reader, Adam is dead, and we are among the first to write his obituary; to make remarks upon his singular birth and death. Poor old man! What an experience he must have had, and his life how eventful! His birth under what peculiar circumstances!

He had no father, no mother, no brother, no sister. He was never an infant; was never rocked to sleep in a little cradle. He never took old Mother "Winniflow's Soothing Syrup"; had never been troubled with toothings or looseness of the bowels; was never doctored for worms; was never spanked for crying; never went to school, to be thumped about by old pedagogues; never carried his sled up hill to ride down; never winked or cast sheep's eyes at girls about his own age.

The first he knew about himself, he stood upon his feet a full grown man; where he came from, or how he got there did not trouble him; he did not care, that was none of his business. It was enough for him to know he was there.

His weight or physical strength, we have no means at this time of determining. If there is anything in science, he must have been very tall, as science teaches a reduction in the height of the human race during each succeeding century. If this is true (and we have no means of disputing the fact) Adam may have been a hundred feet high. We like this theory, for then he looms up before our astonished vision as a being of great magnitude, as a person worthy of being called the father of mankind. We cannot see any reason why he should be small, as it cost him nothing for clothes; the world was large and he had plenty of room for action.

The first thing he did was to look around like a sensible man, mark out his line of business and then pitch in and go to work.

He saw a new world around him only six days old. A new sun, new moon, new stars shining, all bright as silver dollars (at least they were all made and there, and if he did not see them it was his own fault.) All these were beautiful to gaze at, but he had no eye for beauty, no time for gazing. He was more for business. He saw all the animals on the face of the globe from the white bear and moose of the frigid to the elephant and camel of the torrid zones. He also saw all the fowls of heaven from the condor to the humming bird. All these animals and birds were then made each for its peculiar climate and sphere, and yet they were not named. We read that they were all brought to Adam, and he gave them all names.

What large individuality he must have had and what a command of "language"! He gave them all names, both animals and fowls. He did it all in one day. How many words he must have uttered, and how fast his vocal organs must have played? What language he spoke is a mystery to us, or where or when he learned it, or how he discerned the significance of sounds. We suppose he had it all his own way, he made the sound and then attached the signification himself. What a memory he must have had to remember all their proper names! The names of all these animals and fowls. Whether his names were such as we call them in English, or those given them by scientific naturalists, we have no means of determining. We think he used the English language, for this reason; he had never been to college and knew nothing about science, and as science consists in jaw breaking names and terms hard to speak, and as he was in a hurry to get through in one day, we think English was his language; at least we have as good right for that opinion as any other.

This was a great work, a tremendous work to do, all this labor in one day, while the mind and the memory were weak and in their infancy. Had his mind been trained by the study of the Greek and Latin languages at college for four years, we should not think it so great a task; or if he had had age and experience; but remember, he was not yet one day old, he had not had a night's rest; in fact we do not believe he had eaten a meal of victuals; yet he proved himself equal to the emergency; he stood up to the work like a man, and got through long before night, long enough to take a good sound nap, and become prepared for what followed.

After he had done all this work he was tired out and lay down and was soon fast asleep; the sleep was a deep one, and he slept without chloroform under his nose.

While he slept he had a surgical operation performed on him. He had one of his ribs extracted; he was so sleepy and the work was done so skillfully that he did not wake up. What this piece of work would be called in the books of modern surgery we have no idea. We do not believe that the surgeons of the present day can perform the operation in the same manner, and with so little pain, or use a rib when extracted for so great a purpose, or one so useful to all mankind.

The surgeon took the rib and made a woman out of it while Adam still was sleeping; finished her off complete. We suppose this woman, although but a few moments old appeared about eighteen, or thereabouts, at least we presume she looked old enough to marry. When Adam woke up there she stood in all her beauty and all her loveliness. He did not touch his hat (for he had none,) he did not bow to her gracefully, and say, "How are you Madam"? I am agreeably surprised to meet you and am very happy to make your acquaintance," and invite her to take a seat in the shade while he gathered some fruit for her refreshment and entertainment. No, he did none of this; he simply laid his hand on his side and found a rib missing, he began to "smell a mice," and being quick of perception he began to mutter to himself; "bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh," she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man! How they became acquainted; how they learned to talk to each other; what sweet words were uttered; whether they sparkled by moonlight; how they were married, and who said over the ceremony? we have no means of knowing. It is enough for us to know that Adam lived from that day over nine hundred years, and then died, and that we have been writing his obituary; that the writer is his heir in connection with others; that before he died he made a will which was admitted to probate, was never broken, and that we were not forgotten in this will. He willed all he had to us for which we are not thankful. We would rather have paddled our own canoe. We would rather the will had been broken, or that we were not his heirs.

He willed to us his misfortunes, his pains, his aches, his toil, and his sweat, his thorns, and his thistles.

POOR OLD SOUL, we shall remember him for his unbounded generosity and the extreme justice of the courts in securing to us all our rights. As we write our eyes are filled with a dampness approaching a tear, but he has been dead so long it refuses to come forth. So we can only utter with a faltering voice these sad words: "Farewell, Adam, our Ancestor, our father; may thy Eternal Sleep be as pleasant as when the rib was extracted, and hereafter may thy legacy be more equally divided.

CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE.—Were Christianity true, it would be an everlasting disgrace to its devotees, for after a trial of nearly two thousand years, at the present day not one in a hundred of the Race has a particle of real faith in its dogmas. And, as the human family increases, the proportion who become real Christians grows less and less, from year to year. Indeed, it was a failure in the beginning. For Jesus the "author and finisher of faith," himself, if he actually expired upon the cross, died without faith and in utter despair (Math. 27:46.) And, if he did not die upon the cross, then he was never "raised from the dead," and in that case Paul says Christianity is a failure. (1 Cor. 15:14.)

Manliness and Godliness.

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

Manliness is something that we can comprehend. We can picture it to our mind's eye. But what is godliness? Does it mean anything more than manliness? If so, what? I can conceive of nothing greater than manliness: it includes all noble and beautiful qualities—whatever is admirable in action and magnificent in thought. We cannot get beyond it, think as loftily as we will. Why, then, talk of godliness? What is God? Is he anything more than the ideal of human goodness made universal in time and space? Whatever we give to God we must first find in man; that is, the godliness of God is the manliness of man. We cannot go higher than man for our notions of the good, and true, and beautiful. No revelations can come from above, they must be unfolded from within and around. We may idealize what we see and call it "God," and worship it and think there is something in it nobler than ourselves, which we must imitate. But it is not so. The light that we see flashes from our own brain, and to be true to our selves is the holiest act we can perform.

But godliness and manliness are supposed to be two different things. Godliness is affirmed to be something transcendently superior to manliness, a vast, vague glory towards which we must strive and attain even at the sacrifice of manliness. So the latter has been belittled and the former exalted; and it has come that to be a "godly" man is to be no man at all. Human virtues have been flung to the winds, and a shadowy deity been imagined to be all in all.

This is wrong. Strive to be men, and then we are gods. Fulfill the duties of the humblest station, and we are loftier beings than any seated upon a throne be-praised by thousands of angels who are but pale apologies for real men and women. Manliness is the supremest glory that can be pictured to our imagination. The glory of no God can equal it; I think therefore that the term "godliness" had better be laid aside. I can perceive no good meaning in it that is not fresher and more brilliant in the word "manliness." A manly man we know, but a "godly" man, what is he? Let Barnum get one and exhibit; otherwise we shall never know.

Be men and women I say. Don't struggle after something that you know nothing about, but after that which you can comprehend, real earthly goodness. If you strive after the "Infinite," let it be your finite nobleness made infinitely adorable. Don't toil after a theological shadow and lose your faculties in "wide wanderings through eternity." Take the universe from the spot where fate places you, in the power and beauty of your own vision. Make yourself grand for yourself and those about you. Do not follow after a huge fantasy in the heavens. Be manly and womanly, but not "godly."

The Mystic Rap.

Using this as a representative type of the truly mysterious phenomena that occur under the auspices of modern mediumism, it is a miracle in the Bible sense of this term; and supermundane, in a sense that most the so-called miracles of Jesus could not be well said to be. The mystic Rap is not conditioned, like the miracles of Jesus, on human volition or faith. And, what shall be thought of those Spiritualists, who are stupid enough to attempt to turn the influence of this Rap in the support of ancient mediumism, which began its career in the mediumship of a snake. (Gen. 3:2) and an ass. (Num. 22:28.)? And after including "Moses and the Prophets," and "Jesus and the apostles," in that form of mediumship, between God and humanity, its career was closed, finally with the mediumship of a set of monsters, including a calf, which had "eyes behind" where their tails ought to have been.

CHRISTIAN REVIVALS.—For twenty years, the writer was a Methodist minister, engaged in getting up "Revivals." And for more than fifty years I have been perfectly familiar with "revival" epidemics. And I utter what I know, when I declare, that all "revival" phenomena, are human in their development. In my experimental Lectures on Pathetism, in the principal cities throughout the country, from 1836 to 1850, all the "revival" phenomena were produced, by the faith of my auditors in Pathetism. In Philadelphia, 1847, over three hundred cases of trance were counted in one evening. And from year to year, among the thousands entranced in my lectures, I have found Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians (Bishop Brownell attended my lectures in Hartford, Conn.) all of whom testified when in the trance, and out of it, that the experience was precisely the same as had occurred to them from the exercise of faith and prayer in "revivals."

ELISHA THE PROPHET.

In reviewing the wonderful characters mentioned in the Bible and the wonderful achievements they accomplished, Elisha the Prophet must by no means be omitted. He was a man of such remarkable abilities and one who performed such extraordinary feats that he must not be overlooked.

At the time Elijah the Tishbite found him plowing with twelve yoke of oxen, and after boiling the flesh of one yoke of the team with the harness, trappings and implements, and giving the flesh to the people to eat, he followed his master Elijah. Not much is said of him until they parted, at the time when Elijah went up bodily into the air in a chariot of fire, or a whirlwind, or both, or neither. It seems Elijah threw his mantle down to Elisha at the time he took his aerial flight, though we presume before he had gone many miles he found it so cold that he wished he had his blanket again to keep him from freezing. If however, he was riding in a chariot of fire he might have found it quite warm enough for comfort, especially for the parts of his body which came in immediate contact with the chariot.

When Elisha found himself alone, he gathered up the mantle his master had thrown to him and he rent his own clothes, making two pieces of one. He then retraced his steps to the river Jordan and performed his first feat worthy of mention, by smiting the waters with Elijah's mantle, whereupon the waters at once divided as they had done a short time before, when Elijah smote them, piling up like walls on each side, so that Elisha walked over on dry ground. Of all the rivers in the world, the Jordan was the most accommodating. On three occasions we are told its waters thus separated at the wish of man, walling up in a most marvelous manner, while no other, among the hundreds of rivers in the world have ever acted in this manner.

The second astonishing feat which Elisha performed was the "healing" or purifying of a spring of water, by throwing a little salt into it, by which process, waters that before were perfectly worthless, unfit for use, and which had rendered the adjacent land entirely barren were made pure. The salt did the business; not, however, from any chemical action produced, but by the peculiar manner in which the prophet deposited it. Another man might have deposited precisely the same amount of salt and in the same place, but it would have had no effect; it took the prophet to perform this little manipulation. As, however, the effect produced was a good one, as the waters were made pleasant and healthful, and as the land was reclaimed, we can only speak favorably of his labors on this occasion.

His third feat was of a different character, and one no benevolent, humane, kind-hearted person could commend. It seems he was on his way to Beth-el, when a number of children came out of the city and in a thoughtless, childish way sang out to him, "Go up thou bald head." It, perhaps, was not the height of good manners to thus speak to an old, wigless man and a stranger, but we cannot for a moment see how those words could possibly injure him, or why they should have so seriously offended him. But they seem to have made the good man extremely angry, and he turned back and looked upon them savagely and cursed them in the name of the Lord. The words he uttered are not given, but we doubt not, as he "cursed," that they were very much worse than the harmless words the children had used. Sad to relate, as soon as these curses had escaped the lips of the man of God, two she-bears came out of the woods and tore forty-two of the little children all to pieces. We must say this was one of the most cruel, heartless and diabolical pieces of business ever performed; that the thoughtless prattle of children should be punished by tearing forty-two of them by wild beasts, is most abhorrent to every sentiment of sympathy and kindness in the human breast. If Elisha was the author of this cruelty, it is sufficient to cause his name to be execrated and abhorred to the latest moments of time, as a heartless monster and a cruel demon. If the Jewish Jehovah was the author of this terrible conduct, he is equally culpable, and we cannot characterize such savage, unfeeling torture towards little children on his part, in any milder terms than in the case of his prophet.

The fourth memorable feat which Elisha performed was of a more praiseworthy character—the production of a large quantity of water, without wind or rain. There had been a great scarcity of water for men and cattle, when he thus produced it in immense quantity, so that the whole country was fully supplied. In one respect Elisha seems to have transcended Elijah; the latter could produce water by causing rain to fall, but Elisha could bring abundance of water without rain. The process by which he performed this marvel is not divulged, and the world is left in ignorance how one man could make so much water.

The fifth wonder this man performed was in the manufacture of oil. He instructed a widow who had a pot of oil, to borrow all the vessels she could from her neighbors, and by his directions she filled them all with oil by pouring into them from the one vessel she had, which was so supplied, while she poured, as not to be exhausted till all were filled to the brim as long as there were vessels to fill. What a pity that she could not have had a dozen or two of the large tanks we have seen in the oil regions; what an oily time there would have been! Here is a secret richly worth knowing. It would exceed in value a flowing oil well. We know several soap makers who would give a large sum of money for the recipe enabling them to produce oil in this manner.

The sixth labor was not so remarkable, or at all events was within the scope of his natural powers, and similar operations are frequently performed by "men of God" in our own times. The prophet, in occasionally passing by a certain lady's house who had an aged husband, got in the habit of calling upon her, as his business led him in that direction, and he soon became a favorite with the lady, and she caused to be prepared a little chamber for him to "turn into" whenever he came that way. She placed a bed, a table and a candlestick in his little chamber, thus affording him a comfortable place to enjoy himself in, during his frequent friendly visits. All this, we say, was done at the instance of the woman, who contracted a warm friendship for the Prophet. Her husband, we repeat, was a very old man, and though she was a large woman, and doubtless robust and healthy, she had no children. The Prophet noticed all this, and came to her relief. He had his servant, Gehazi, call her one day to his room, and, after holding a short conversation with her, and they passed a limited period in each other's society, he assured her that in course of time she would have a child, and he, being a prophet, could of course speak with certainty. Sure enough, in about nine months she had a son. The prophet was right, and here we have another remarkable exemplification of the great gift of prophecy.

We mention this matter of the large woman having a child, not as being anything very wonderful in itself. Though her husband were one hundred years of age, when a woman is fortunate enough to have a "man of God" in the house, all these little difficulties can be surmounted. We merely mention it, as it leads to, and is connected with the Prophet's seventh great feat.

When the woman's son got to be a lad large enough to run into the fields, he was one morning taken with a bad headache, and was conveyed to his mother. She held him in her lap till noon, when he died—or at all events appeared to die. The mother took the child and laid him on the Prophet's bed, and then hastened without delay to Mount Carmel to inform the Prophet of the sad event. He knew her at once when she was still some distance off, and sent Gehazi to enquire how she and the boy were. She was not long in informing him how it was with the lad, and he soon concluded to return with her. He sent his servant on ahead to lay his staff upon the body of the boy, to see if it would restore him, but it had no effect. When he arrived, however, he lay upon the boy, putting mouth to mouth, eyes to eyes, and hands to hands. The body of the child soon began to grow warm, and he sneezed seven times and opened his eyes, a pretty good sign that if he had been dead he was so no longer.

Here, again, Elisha showed himself equal to his preceptor, Elijah. If one had raised the dead, so had the other. But as we have not faith enough to believe that any person really dead has ever been made to live again, we claim the right to think that if these stories are true at all, they were merely instances of suspended animation, and that the warmth of the prophets' bodies and their magnetism had favorably affected those lying in a comatose, or cataleptic state, by which means respiration and circulation were restored. The lad, at all events, was resuscitated, and the Prophet afterwards showed his partiality for the mother and child, when a seven years' famine came upon the country, by sending them away to the land of the Philistines, where there was plenty, and also in recovering her property for her upon her return. It is not stated what became of her aged husband, but it is altogether likely that he died.

Elisha's eighth feat was to destroy the poisonous effects of some wild gourds which had been used with herbs to make pottage for the sons of prophets, amounting to one hundred in number, and who, by the by, on account of the scarcity of provisions, had become very hungry. He neutralized the poison by sprinkling a little meal in the pot—a simple and easy way, to be sure; but if another man had put it in, it would, probably, have done no good.

The Prophet's ninth feat was the curing of Naaman of leprosy, by hydropathic treatment, but, since cures as remarkable have been made by Priessnitz and his disciples, it is unnecessary to dwell upon the treatment here. One thing, however, Elisha did, which Priessnitz could not do, and that was to transfer a disease from one person to another, as the Prophet did, by fastening on Gehazi the leprosy which he removed from Naaman.

Elisha's tenth wonder was a performance of no mean pretensions. Several men were felling trees on the banks of the Jordan, when one of them accidentally lost his axe in the river, and of course it immediately sank to the bottom. The unfortunate man bewailed his loss, more especially as the axe was a borrowed one. This was certainly creditable to the fellow, for there are many who would care less about losing a borrowed axe than if it were their own. The Prophet, however, soon made it all right by throwing a stick into the water, thereby causing the axe to float on the surface. This is, unquestionably, a difficult trick to perform, as iron and steel are some ten times heavier than water. If any one doubts the difficulty of performing the feat, let him throw an axe into the river, and see how hard a job it will be to make it float. Nature's laws, of course, had to be set aside, and the force of gravitation had to be suspended, to cause an axe, unaided, to float upon the surface of a river; but who knows what a man of God cannot do?

As the eleventh great achievement, may be mentioned his causing, by prayer, the eyes of a young man to be opened, so that he saw mountains full of horses and chariots of fire about the Prophet, and then by prayer caused blindness to fall upon a multitude. The first might have been a mere illusion, and we hope the last was only temporary blindness.

As great as this man was, and as much power as he possessed, old age and disease at last came upon him, and he died. He was not taken up into heaven in a carriage, as his predecessor had been, but was buried like an ordinary individual; but to show what remarkable virtue existed in his very bones, it may be stated, as the twelfth wonder connected with this remarkable man, that after he had been some time buried, and when another body was let down into the same grave, the moment it touched the bones of Elisha it was instantly reanimated, and stood upon its feet. The bones of very few dead men possess this wonderful power.

A remarkable fact in the history of Elisha, as well as his master, Elijah, may be mentioned. In the Book of Kings a great deal is said about the two worthies, and they seemed to have very much to do with the affairs of the kings ruling at that time, and of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The wonderful feats they performed are mentioned in detail. The events of their lives seem much mixed up with the affairs of State, and the reader would readily suppose they were the two most important personages then living. But in Chronicles, where the reigns of the same kings, Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoshaphat and Jehoram are given, Elisha is not mentioned, and Elijah is named but once, and then as having sent a writing to Jehoram, which could not have taken place till some seven years after he was said, in Kings, to have gone up in a chariot of fire to heaven.

In Chronicles nothing is said about the three years without rain or dew (and it would seem that the writer of that book ought to have known of the circumstance, if such a remarkable event occurred). Nothing is said about Elijah's calling down fire from heaven and burning a bullock, stones, dirt and water, and one hundred men. Nothing is said about his slaying four hundred and fifty men with his own hands. No mention is made of his parting the river Jordan with his mantle, and not a word is uttered about his going up in a fiery chariot. And not one of the wonderful performances of Elisha which we have named, is even hinted at. If Chronicles is a truthful book; if it is a part of the word of God, and if these events did really occur, the existence of these men at least ought to have been recognized, and their wonderful works mentioned. That they were not, is, to say the least, a very suspicious circumstance; and this fact, taken in connection with the improbable, unnatural and impossible deeds ascribed to them in Kings, is enough to make practical, matter-of-fact minds reject the entire narrative.

Christianity Examined.—No. X.

The extreme doubt whether such a person as Jesus Christ had a real existence is made more and more apparent the fuller the matter is investigated. The fact that he never wrote a line that has been handed down to posterity, that the world has no possible means of knowing any thing about such a personage having lived save what is obtained from the unknown authors of what are called the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John; and when there is no evidence that these books were written before the second century, it can be readily understood that the life and character of the individual under consideration is extremely mythical.

Our opponents frequently quote a paragraph found in Josephus, corroborating the claim that such a person did live at one time in Judea. But Dr. Lardner, one of the most eminent Christian historians, long ago pronounced this an interpolation, a forgery, and that it never existed in the original manuscript of Josephus. This opinion of Dr. Lardner was also entertained by Gibbon, Ittigius, Blondell, Le Clerc, Vandale, Bishop Warburton, and Tanaquil Faber, the most of whom are noted Christian authorities. In fact the first Christian writers and authors of the past, as well as of the present day, unite in agreeing that the paragraph alluded to is a forgery. Eusebius, in the fourth century, was the first to call attention to the spurious passage, and he is generally accredited with having inserted the paragraph referring to Jesus. On several occasions Eusebius proved himself amply able to use interpolation, spurious additions and forgeries. Mosheim, in his Ecclesiastical History, page 70, in alluding to this characteristic of the early Christian Fathers, uses this language, that "it was not only lawful, but commendable to deceive and lie for the sake of truth and piety." It is lamentable that so little reliance can be placed upon the authenticity of the Christian writers in the early centuries of our era. The fact that they were crafty and designing men, and that they used their best abilities to build up the new system of religion which they had allied themselves to, requires no additional proof.

It is a well-known fact that, in the first and second centuries, there were three distinct classes of Christians; one the Gnostics, who firmly held that such a person or individual as Christ had not had an existence as a man in the flesh, and that he was a spirit only. The Arians were another class, who admitted that there was a man Jesus, but that he was merely a human being, and not a God. The third class maintained that he not only existed in the flesh, but that he was also the eternal God of heaven and earth. The disputes and quarrels between these contending factions became very heated and bitter, until finally the third class, by strategy and superior numbers, overpowered those who denied that such a person as Christ had had a real existence, and forced them to abandon the field, and it afterwards became a recognized dogma of the Church that Jesus had not only been a man, but, also, was absolutely God. But that large numbers in the first two centuries did persistently and stoutly contend that such a person as Christ had not had a real existence in the body, cannot be effectually gainsayed, and is well calculated to excite our liveliest suspicions.

In taking into consideration the characteristics of men who have played an active part in different ages of the world in establishing the various systems of religion and creeds the world has known, it is not difficult to appreciate how such a system as Christianity might have gained a foothold among men without the events strictly having transpired which are claimed. In our own day, we have seen Mormonism arise from the merest pretenses and the barest assertions, and have seen it within a few decades grow into a system that now has very considerable strength and has the implicit confidence of thousands.

Mahometanism is another illustration of this religious growth. It originated in the claims, assertions and assumptions of an individual, and gradually spread over several countries until hundreds of millions accepted it as a God-given religion, and they have not a shade of doubt but what it is the most divine bequest ever made to the world. Those of us who are not under the influence of this religion, can easily see where its devotees are mistaken, and that they have been misled by designing or deluded leaders. If it is impossible for us to feel the same veneration for their creed and their superstitions that they do, we can complacently and dispassionately view the position they occupy, with the disinterestedness of an outside observer, and can easily perceive the mistakes and fallacies they have made, as well as comprehend the untenability of the divine claims they set up.

So it is with Christianity. To those not encircled within the influence which it exerts, and who do not bow to the demands which it sets up, are able to see not only its defects, but the errors it makes in claiming a direct divine origin.

When we find that the authorities upon which a system rests are defective, and that they do not corroborate the claims put forth by its advocates, we have good grounds to doubt its truth. We remarked that the four gospels were unknown till near the close of the second century, or rather that there is no proof of their having an earlier existence. Irenæus was the first Christian writer who referred to them or recognized them as being extant, and he died in the forepart of the third century. Other pretended and spurious gospels, almost without number, had been known prior to this, but they were discarded as fraudulent, and those upon which the grand fabric of Christianity is founded, were unknown till near two hundred years after the time Jesus was said to have lived. What an uncertain data to build upon. What a fine opportunity was here afforded the early fathers to get up the Gospel story, or to have it written to order. The gospels have been attributed to various Christian fathers, as well as to bishops, priests and monks, but with what amount of truth it is now impossible to demonstrate. It is also claimed the plot of the Gospel story was handed down from the Essenes, the Therapists and the monks of Egypt, and was revised, re-written and re-located by Christians in the early centuries, similar to what Shakespeare did by the most of his plays, the plots of which were borrowed from the inventions and traditions of earlier times.

The Nicene Council, consisting of several hundred quarrelsome and pugilistic bishops, called together by that wholesale Christian murderer, Constantine, which assembled in the year 325, in which contentions and fights without number took place, took into consideration the authenticity of fifty or more "gospels," written by different individuals, and after indulging in the most acrimonious dissensions and fist-fights, finally decided by vote whether the different gospels presented were the word of God. They rejected all but the four now in the Testament, and one of those was admitted by a single vote; but it was not until the middle of the sixth century that the books now composing the New Testament were fully settled upon, several of them having been persistently discarded by previous authorities. Thus, we see, by what a frail tenure our boasted "word of God" hangs, and how easy it was for fraud and deception to have been practiced in getting it up.

The facts we have here mentioned, together with others we have before alluded to, the close resemblance between Jesus and the numerous demi-gods and teachers who preceded him, are quite sufficient to shake the confidence of the most credulous devotee in the actuality of his existence. Christna, Buddha and others have been considered, but if it is not too much like repetition, we will call attention to others who preceded Jesus, and to whom his acts and sayings bear a very strong resemblance, ALCIDES, of Egypt, was said to have been born of a virgin; to have performed miraculous cures; to have converted water into wine; to have cast out devils; to have raised two persons from the dead; to have restored sight to the blind; to have made the dumb to speak and the lame to walk. For Osiris, also, similar claims were made.

Of PYTHAGORAS, of Greece, his devout followers asserted that he was originally a spirit from heaven; that his birth was miraculously foretold; that his mother, a virgin, conceived by a spectre; that in his youth he astonished the doctors by his learning and knowledge; that he could foretell events; that he could subdue wild beasts; that he could be in two places at once; that he could walk on water; that he could handle poisonous serpents without injury; that he cured all manner of diseases; restored sight to the blind; cast out devils; allayed tempests; raised people from the dead, and thousands, almost, of other wonderful feats as narrated by Jamblicus. He was said to possess a very humble disposition; to be very kind to the poor; to have fasted and prayed, and that he advised his disciples to forsake relatives and houses and lands for religion's sake. In precepts, moral lessons and purity of life, there was a great similarity between him and Jesus, but the latter is not claimed to have existed till the former had been dead five hundred years.

PROMETHEUS was a mythical character, but five centuries before the time of Jesus it was held of him that he had a miraculous birth, that he had a band of disciples; that he taught the best moral precepts; that he was finally crucified as an expiation for mankind amid signs, wonders, and miracles; that nature was convulsed, and that deceased saints arose from their graves; that the sun was darkened and refused to shine; that after crucifixion he descended into hell, and was afterwards seen to ascend into heaven.

APOLLONIUS of Tyana, in Cappadocia, had faithful disciples and biographers in Damos and Philostratus, who made great claims for this remarkable personage, and which were implicitly believed by great numbers of people. That he had a miraculous conception; that his mother was a virgin; that all nature was subject to his power; that he performed great numbers of miraculous cures; that he restored the blind to sight; made the lame to walk; cast out devils; raised the dead; read the thoughts of those around him; caused a tree to bloom; spoke in languages he never learned; that he was transfigured; that he led a spotless life; that he did not marry, and opposed sexual pleasures; that he spent his time in teaching those who gathered around him; that he was a prophet, and could foretell events; that he was imprisoned and loaded with chains; that he was crucified midst a display of divine power; that he rose from the dead; that he appeared to his disciples after his resurrection; that he finally ascended up to heaven to sit at the right hand of the Father, and much more of a similar character, and fully equal in every respect to what was claimed for Jesus.

Of SIMON MAGUS, who also existed before Christ, it

What I think of Christ.

An answer to some questions from a "Christian Friend."

BY WILLIAM WILLICOTT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND: "You say that Christ, standing as he does, the central figure of the Christian religion, exhibits in his character the very embodiment of all perfection; and so satisfies our highest ideas that he is surrounded with such a halo of glory, that challenges the homage, adoration, and love of every human being."

Now, is it not strange that two individuals, averaging about the same mental ability, will, on reading the same record of Christ's life (and we positively do know nothing of him, except what is supposed to be the true story as given by Mark, Matthew, John, and Luke) come to such opposite conclusions?

I can only account for it in this way: that with one or the other of us, there has been a very imperfect, or incomplete examination: or that influenced by educational teaching, we bring to the examination our own preconceived opinions—the glamour which the long-ages have thrown around the name of Christ, and we thus seek, not to discover "WHAT IS TRUTH," but search for evidence to sustain our convictions, which we already deem to be the truth!

It is the fashion of the present-day theology, to preach Christ as the very beau idéal of human perfection; that in his life there was such a sublimity of moral glory, to which it is possible for us mortals to approach in some slight degree, but whose meridian splendor we can never hope to attain.

"Time works changes," It was not orthodox to speak thus of the man nature of Christ in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Calvin, in one of his sermons on "Christ's Godhead," says something like this: (I cannot give the exact words, for I am quoting from the memory of a long-long ago, but the idea, the sentiment is correct), "that when Christ cursed the barren fig-tree, he did it as a petulant, irritable human being. He was foot-sore, and weary; faint with the summer heat, and seeing the fig-tree afar off, already in imagination he was eating its delicious fruit, and reposing under its grateful shade; finding it barren, in the anger of disappointment, he cursed it—and this he did as man—for in his human nature, Christ had control over the elements of this lower world. But when on the cross, he uttered the memorable words: 'this day shalt thou be with me in paradise;' it was the very voice of him 'who commanded, and it was done,' 'God over all, blessed forever.' But the theology of that age would be as much out of place in our churches at this day, as the court dresses of the time of Queen Elizabeth. Our popular preachers, those who carry the masses with them, ever seek to harmonize their teachings, in some slight degree, with the awakening thought and dawning intelligence of the day.

"Shall I write up Christ from the orthodox standard?" says Beecher to his publishers. Anything you please: "you pay your money, and you take your choice." I'm for sale, like merchandise in a public mart.

HAMLET: "Do you see yonder cloud, that's almost in shape of a camel?"

POLONIUS: "By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed."

HAMLET: "Methinks, it is like a weasel."

POLONIUS: "It is backed like a weasel."

HAMLET: "Or, like a whale?"

POLONIUS: "Very like a whale."

Thus our clerical Poloniuses ever adapt themselves to suit the pressure of the changing times. So it is the human nature, the humanitarian side of Christ that is preached to-day. It is long since I have heard a sermon on the Godhead of Christ—very God, and very God. The intelligence of the age repudiates this dogma; and just so in the coming age, will be dimmed the halo which now encircles his human nature. What says the New Testament of Christ? "To the testimony" let us appeal; take him as represented by the record, that is called inspired, and he certainly is without that moral beauty or comeliness which our Christian friends ascribe to him.

That he made his followers believe he was the deliverer which was to come, who should redeem the Jews from their Roman bondage, is very plain.

"Is it lawful to pay tribute unto Cæsar?"

"Whose image and superscription is this?" was his reply.

"And they said unto him Cæsar's."

"Then render unto Cæsar, the things that are Cæsar's."

This is not the language of a bold, an earnest reformer; it is weak, ambiguous—it is cowardly. If as our friend, Mr. Bowen says, "that Christ was a great moral and political reformer," then right here he lost the grandest opportunity of his life.

Garrison was once asked in a Southern State, with the halter almost around his neck, if the Constitution of the United States did not guarantee the South in the protection of slavery, and his memorable reply was: "Then it is a covenant with death, an agreement with hell!"

I have heard it often said that Christ's loving gentleness was more than that of woman;" yet we read the bitter, cruel words, "Woman, what have I to do with thee;" those were strange words to fall from the lips of one whose heart throbbed to encircle the whole world in his arms of affection. "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone;" can you put this command of Christ into practice? Try it. Raze your penitentiaries! Burn your prisons! Open the gates of all your jails and let the prisoners free, for they have been wrongfully sentenced: every one has been unjustly condemned. No judge in all this broad land, can come up to the requirements that Christ deemed necessary, to pass sentence. How many sermons eloquently grand, have been preached from those words; yet when you bring them to the test of inexorable logic, they are as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." We pass on. "And I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Tell me what those fearful words mean. To whom has been given the power thus to "bind and loose?" The Catholic Church, that monster of oppression, every page of whose history is written with human blood, flings those words in our face, as their authority, by which all can damn, and curse, from Pope to priest. If Christ did use those words, knowingly, understandingly, then his name should be held in everlasting execration. I have sometimes thought that in that night of terror, in Gethsemane's garden, that Christ caught a glimmering of that day of blood, that was about to dawn; some slight premonition of those coming centuries when his name "should be desolation's watchword." If he did, then I can well understand his agonizing prayer, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me."

"Believe, and thou shalt be saved; doubt, and thou shalt be damned." Unjust! unjust! A wise and good being never could have uttered these words. Damned for a belief!—a mere opinion!

"And no for any guile or ill They've done afore thee."

Unjust! unjust! for there is no truth in mental philosophy that can be so clearly demonstrated as this: that belief is not dependent on the will. If then I must be damned for being an Infidel, then through all the never-ending ages of eternity, will I not cease to cry, unjust! unjust!

Why, my dear friend, I have had no more to do with making myself an Infidel, than I have with the formation of the rings of Saturn. Nor was I one from reading the writings of Voltaire, Spinoza, or Paine. I was one long before I had read a single page of their writings; but it was from the Bible; taking it, as I had been taught to believe it, God's word—God's revealed will to man; and by reading President Edwards' masterly treatise, "On the Will." How many Arminian controversialists have butted their brains in vain against the unassailable rock of logic. Edwards forced me, by his irresistible argument to become an Infidel, against will, inclination, and self-interest. Sometimes I think that a history of the mental conflict I went through in those years, would make most excellent reading for the New York Observer.

"Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?"

"Tis election known by calling,

It's a privilege divine;

Saints are kept from final falling,

All the glory, Lord, is thine."

And am I to be damned, because the grace has not been given, so that I can say, "even so, Father, for thus it seemeth good in thy sight."

Believe, and thou shalt be saved; doubt, and thou shalt be damned. What must I believe? This: that Christ died for my sins, and he being God the second, made atonement to God the first for those sins, by shedding his blood on the cross—paying to God the first, his own father, by so doing, the penalty of my sins, and this nearly two thousand years before I was born, long, long ages before there was a possibility of my committing any sin; and I to-day, by merely crediting this strange sacrifice, become "a child of God," and entitled to all the joys of paradise. Now God has not given me his grace, by which I can believe this monstrous absurdity, for it is abhorrent to every fibre of my being. I cannot acquiesce in the justice of being damned, because I have no desire for a blood bath; I would rather, ten thousand times, go with John the Baptist, and take a plunge in the pellucid waters of the river Jordan. A remark a lady made to me some years ago, applies here very pertinently she said "she never knew any orthodox Christians among the believers in the 'water cure.'" "A healthy body generally gives a healthy mind," is a truth to which the world is just beginning to awake. Healthy, life-giving food, with good air and a clean skin promote a healthy condition; we should look closely to these sources of health. Each and every one of us must be our own saviors. In reading Payson's sermons, you well know the man did not live out "half his days."

A healthy body will generally give a healthy mind. It is we ourselves who must work out our own salvation. Not the blood of bulls nor goats, nor twice ten thousand sacrificial lambs, can recall the cruel look, unsay the unkind word, undo the deed committed, that we would give worlds to forget. Conscience like an "avenging angel," makes them the skeleton at "our every feast."

The blood of Christ is not potent enough to give to those memories the balm of forgetfulness. The doctrine of the atonement, the penalty due to me for my sins, paid by another, seems to me, to be so repulsive to all the feelings of a healthy and manly nature, that it would only require to be stated, to be instinctively rejected.

The dying God! The atoning sacrifice! is a dogma so monstrous that it taxes even the credulity of the Christian, and compels him to exclaim, "Reason stands aghast! and faith herself is half confounded." Christ then as God is utterly repudiated by judgement, reason, everything that goes to form and make up my intellectual nature.

Christ as man! is not to me a perfect, a full-rounded, and complete character; he does not come up, by a very long way, to my own ideal, and thus he cannot fill my heart with either admiration or love; and if for this I am to be damned, then I say Christ's words are pre-eminently unjust. "Believe, and thou shalt be saved, doubt, and thou shalt be damned!" If Christ is so lovely that he is "the chief among ten thousand," then I must be compelled—irresistibly compelled to love him, and I know I should not need the incentive of a reward to do so. We are so constituted that we must love what appears to us beautiful and attractive. I love, and dearly love, this beautiful earth, with its mountains and glens. I love to gaze on the silent stars of night, and the pale and solemn moon, and the glorious sun, as he goes down in the west, pillowed with clouds of crimson, and of gold; and find delight in every flower, joy in every bird that flies. There is no reward promised for loving all this beauty; and there is no need, for as you gaze, the mind is thrilled with wonder and with awe, too deep for words. The words "believe, and thou shalt be saved," etc., are not worthy of a great teacher; they appeal to the very lowest, selfish feelings of our nature, and the hope of a reward or punishment should never be taken into consideration in coming to a right, manly, and just decision on any question.

Ah! but say you "what a talismanic power there is even to-day in the name of Christ." "At his name how the quickened pulse throbs with the ecstasy of adoring love." You have read that long, bloody page, which his followers have written; which reaches all the way up to the opening of the sixteenth century; and this your talismanic name of Christ, it was, that turned his followers into tigers, thirsting for human blood, and not a day passed but "blood red rainbows canopied the land." Fearfully, fearfully, have the words of Christ been fulfilled. "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." But the Christian religion is not the only one whose devotees would willingly and joyfully die in its defense. Every great captain has had followers, who would brave all—dare all. Call up one of the "old guards," and speak the name Napoleon, and see how quickly the tear-mist clouds the eye, as the name of the loved chieftain falls on the listening ear. There has been no name given under heaven that ever had the potency and power for the time being like that of Napoleon Bonaparte. Mahomet's name must surely have been a force as potent as Christ's; for to-day his disciples are more in number, and when the hordes of invaders, by the sanction and at the command of the Christian church, went forth to devastate with fire and sword, and to destroy a civilization that was higher, grander than their own (how the crusaders were astonished at the glories of Constantinople, with its minarets and towers first fell upon their wondering sight), they found to their cost that those followers of the prophet were possessed by the same religious zeal, were as ready to fight, and to die in defense of their religion, as the Christian.

Every religion has had its thousands of martyrs, who bravely have died in its defense. "If falsehood has its martyrs, what is the criterion of truth?"

But it would take two volumes octavo to review the life of Christ as presented by the records, and as I must not monopolize the entire pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will now come to his death, and close for the present.

It has been said that "Socrates died like a man, but Christ like a God." This sentence is often quoted, and is considered eloquently expressive, but it is entirely without meaning; for as it is impossible to know how a God should die, we cannot know if Christ in his death came up to the requirements that would make the death of a God worthy of our admiration.

But allow me to say, in passing, that I am not very certain that Christ ever did die; for the account that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John give us of his death is so very contradictory that their testimony is almost worthless, and according to the rules of legitimate evidence is entitled to be thrown out of court; for it is required that the witnesses shall agree in important particulars. We shall see presently in what harmonious agreement the writers of his life stand. Another most excellent test of the falsehood of a story is the silence of all contemporaneous writers, and when this is the case we are certainly justified in saying that the whole thing is entirely improbable, and was written in a much later age. Now as regards the story of Christ's life and death all contemporaneous history is silent. But you have forgotten that celebrated passage in Josephus. No, I have not forgotten it: nor have I forgotten that the great scholar and philosopher "Dr. Lardner," indelibly stamps it as a forgery.

Let us then look at a few of those glaring discrepancies and contradictions. Matthew says the thieves also which were crucified with him "cast the same in his teeth, that is, the mocking and reviling of the priests, scribes, elders," etc. Mark says also that "they who were crucified with him reviled him." John only says that "Christ was crucified with two others with him, he being in the midst." Neither of these three says anything of the conversion of one of the thieves, nor of the promise of Christ that "this day he should be with him in paradise." But it is the account given by Luke to which the Christian Church gives prominence in this particular, and by the example that Christ there gives, they go at the foot of the gallows, and take a human monster, who was born in sin, shapen in iniquity, whose every breath from birth to death has been pollution, and then will send him straight to "Abraham's bosom," with hallelujah to the glory of God. But see how different is Luke's story from the others. His words are, "If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us." Now from those words, does this man deserve the obloquy with which the Christian world covers him? "Save thyself and us," he says: the benefit that he asks for himself, he asks also for others. Why was his prayer not answered? Was it because it is said "one shall be taken and the other left?"

The other, asking selfishly for a blessing for himself alone, obtains it, for to him Christ says: This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Now there certainly is nothing in Luke's account of the conduct of the two men, to merit this distinction—that one should be sent to hell, and the other to heaven. See also, how they differ in their account of Christ's own death: John says that Christ's dying words were, "It is finished," and he bowed his head and gave up the ghost." Luke says that he said "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." But Matthew and Mark make him utter the despairing cry, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani! My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Luke and John make Christ to die very respectably, indeed. But according to Matthew and Mark, he dies in the very agony of despair. It would be very amusing to you were I to give you the different explanations that Christian theologians have given in their endeavors to harmonize those fatal contradictions. If he did die as Matthew and Mark say he did, then his doctrines were not able to sustain him in the hour of his greatest need. He did not die triumphantly. He did not die gloriously. He did not die like a man.

Cranmer and Latimer, and, for the honor of our human nature be it said, thousands of his own followers vindicated their title to the name of man, and died more heroically—far more courageously, than did their master. Christ in his death has no claim to the martyr's crown, for if Matthew and Mark tell the truth, it was in deed inglorious—most inglorious.

Why to me, our loved and honored Charles Sumner, in his martyrdom, appears as far above Christ as the heavens are higher than the earth. Who ever heard from his lips the complaining word? He drank the bitter cup to its very dregs. He never once uttered the coward's prayer, that it might pass from him. No, No! In his death there was sublime heroism; his only anxiety at that supreme moment was that the work for which he had given his life might be completed: "Take care of my Civil Rights Bill," were the last words of our own glorious Sumner.

Who is there so cold, to whose eye the tear will not start, as he reads the touching lines of Whittier?—

"And when the hour supreme had come,
Not for himself a thought he gave;
In that last pang of martyrdom,
His care was for the half-freed slave."

And the coming age, whose dawning light is even already seen in our eastern sky, will take the halo of glory which the superstition of the past have thrown around this mythic Christ, and place it on the brows of those great and noble men of our age and generation, who have carried us in their strong arms, forced our hearts to beat with higher aspirations, and taught us to live for nobler and loftier purposes. And to those men shall yet be ascribed "all glory."

"All honor! all praise, now and forever, Let these be thy gods! O, Israel."

Yours, not in Christ, but in kindness and human sympathy.

ADDENDA.

It might be said that I have entirely omitted to say anything of the beautiful sayings that Christ uttered, or the noble doctrines he preached to the people. I know it; I will consider them some other time. I will now in this addenda just say that it is not right or fair to give to Christ the credit of first giving them to the world: all this I most emphatically say is historically untrue. Mr. Beecher is even compelled under the light of this present day to say, "that the sermon on the Mount and the Lord's prayer are not original with Christ." John Morley, the editor of the "Fortnightly Review," says in his able and searching analysis of Mill's three essays on religion in a late number of that magazine: "Readers receive so many shocks to their faith in these days—that the impression of any one of them seldom lasts more than a few weeks. Perhaps therefore they have ample time to forget a shock they received seven years ago. A learned scholar then showed them that the sublimest dicta of the gospels found exact parallels in the Talmud, and warned them that to assume that the Talmud borrowed from the New Testament would be like assuming that Sanskrit sprang from Latin, or that French was developed from the Norman words found in English; and the wider our knowledge extends, the fainter becomes the claims made for the gospel moralities as original, new, or exceptionally profound in insight," and he also says, which is certainly an endorsement of the view I have here taken of Christ; that we construct an ideal figure out of the sayings, the life, and the character of the great figure of the gospels, and we do this only on condition of shutting our eyes to about one-half of the portraits of Christ as drawn in the gospels. Not merely are some essential elements of the highest morality omitted, but there are positive injunctions and positive traits recorded which must detract in the highest degree from the justice of an unqualified eulogium. Thus on the shores of old superstition, the waves of free thought still rise, higher—still higher.

Cruelty and Credulity of the Human Race

BY DR. DANIEL ARTER, CAIRO, ILL.

As far back as history extends, man has always been the most barbarous, blood-thirsty, treacherous, and tyrannical creature of all the animal creation.

I know that this is strong language; but the history of the race fully warrants it.

Man's first and highest object in life has always been the attainment of wealth, eminence and power, that, through an exercise of these he might enslave and subjugate his fellow men to his service; and to achieve these ends he has rejected no means, however base—murder and even fratricide not excepted—utterly unmindful of the love or wrath of God, or the opinion of men.

The most potent power for the enslavement of men has been, and continues to be, priestcraft, operating upon the ignorance and superstition of the masses. Long before the Genesal creation, priests ruled and controlled the masses, through their ignorance and superstitious fears. No sooner had Moses established his power than he fastened upon the people a herd of priests and their attendants, chiefly of his own kindred, who fattened upon their substance, exacting two-fifths of their earnings, as well as everything devoted both of man and beast—of their fruits and wines—demanding peace-offerings, burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, atonement-offerings, as also a share of the spoils taken from enemies, virgin maidens not excepted. All this was exacted under threats of the dire wrath of their Jewish god, Jehovah. Happily for that people, however, the Lord had not, at that time, prepared his burning lake of fire, nor even intimated a state of future existence.

After the partial overthrow of this tyrannical reign of priestcraft and oppression, the priests, in order to maintain power, found it necessary to promulgate a new theological dogma, and to devise means to impose it upon the credulity of the masses. To effect this, they went back to a time anterior to the creation of the world to provide a Savior; and to utilize this Savior it became necessary to find some one to be saved as well as a fall to be saved from. Hence the "original sin" in the Garden of Eden, and the curse of the angry Jehovah, which is said to have descended to us in this thousandth generation. They denounced all who did not embrace their dogma and contribute to their support, as enemies of God, who were without the pale of mercy, doomed to an ever-burning lake of brimstone—they and their progeny, even the infant not a span in length. This is Calvinism. But here the good and pious Dr. Watts comes in—the God-loving creature who was so delighted in the imaginary groans and shrieks of those infant spirits, that he set his fancies into metrical verse, to be sung as sweet music to the glory of God. Let this God-serving creature be heard:

"There is a never-dying hell,
And never-dying pains.
Where children must, with demons dwell,
In darkness, fire, and chains.
Have faith the same in endless shame,
In all the human race;
For hell is crammed with infants damn'd.
Without a day of grace."

How impressive these "sacred lines," when announced from a tasselled pulpit by a black-coated, white-cravated divine, and sung, with an organ prelude, by a devout congregation, with upturned faces, and rolling eyes? Yes, dear mothers and dear friends who have been bereft of your infant darlings:

† A. W. Newman.

"There is a never-ending hell,
And never-dying pains,
Where children must, with demons dwell,
In darkness, fire, and chains!"
[Hallelujah!]
"For hell is crammed with infants damned,
Without a day of grace."

Is there—can there be any conception more horrible than this, to the mind of man, or more blasphemous in the eyes of a Father-God? And yet this was one of the means employed by the so-called minister of God, to frighten the honest, the ignorant and unsuspecting, into orthodox, Christian traces!

Is God consistent? If so, was it consistent to create a Savior before there was any one to be saved, or a doom to be saved from? And has he saved us from the curse said to have been pronounced against us through our original parents? Let us, for a moment, examine the wording of the curse, as pronounced by God himself: leaving the snake to crawl upon its belly, as it is reasonable to suppose it always did, and to "eat dust," as it is reasonable to suppose it does not now, and never did! Referring to this curse, I must confess that, owing to my early Christian training, so deeply was this perverted passage impressed upon my mind, that for many years I labored under the delusion that it was irrevocably fixed upon all the posterity of Adam.

But, to my text: Genesis, ch. 3; verses 17, 18, and 19: And unto the woman he said, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrows and thy conception; and in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be unto thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

And to Adam he said: "Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree which I commanded you, saying thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat of the herb of the field."

"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread, till thou return unto the ground, for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Now let us inquire: Is this curse removed? Are mothers saved from the sorrow and pains of parturition, even the most devoted Christian believers? I tell you, from numerous and painful observations, during a medical practice of nearly two score years, No! No! Does not the ground still bring forth thorns and thistles? Does not man still eat his bread in the sweat of his face, and does he not go down to the ground from which he was taken? How all this, which is but the fate and experience of the human family, can be accepted as punishment for the "original sin," is beyond my comprehension, and finds no warrant in reason, justice, or common sense. Admitting its truth, the curse can only be accepted according to the literal meaning and import of the words, and not in a metaphorical sense. Accepting it thus, no man can escape from, or avoid it, unless God changes his "immutable laws," in which case he would prove himself fallible. Then, by what forced constructions or figurative twistings this curse can be tortured into a "penal hereafter," from which man can only be saved through faith in a mythical Savior, priests alone must explain. The Lord did not intimate a future in his curse; but limited the punishment to the time when man should return unto the ground, out of which he was taken. This high authority (the Lord himself), gives no intimation of a life beyond the grave; of a burning hell, or of a new Jerusalem of future bliss. Yet this (the original sin, and atonement through a Savior's blood), is to this day, the very corner-stone of Christian creeds—the great "open-sesame," by which the ignorant and credulous masses are robbed of millions every year (in many cases entailing misery and privation, and not unfrequently insanity), that a crafty, and often imbecile priesthood may be supported in ease, indolence, and luxury. Compare our spacious and gorgeous churches, their ornamented walls, and tasselled pulpits, carpeted aisles, and cushioned pews, gilded chandeliers, and costly organs, with the lowly cottage, with its bare walls and coarse and scanty furniture, with the half-clad, pale-faced mother, poorly clothed children—the father, if living, striving day by day to provide scanty supplies, and who, if found mending his boot, sawing his wood, or cultivating his garden on the so-called holy Sabbath, is denounced as a worker of iniquity, if he is not arrested and fined as a culprit; while the Church, by a species of fraud, gambling, and begging continually adds to its horde of wealth, and is lauded for its success! The poor man, even the widow, with an only cow, a rickety cook stove, and bed of straw, is taxed, while the Church, grand in its wealth and over-shadowing magnificence, is exempt; and yet the poor, who are unable to clothe themselves up to the orthodox standard to appear in those consecrated temples, are expected from their scanty means to contribute to their support! Should some unfortunate mother with her children obtrude her presence in these hallowed sanctuaries, clothed in the humble garb that befits her means and station in life, she becomes the gazing stock of the congregation, and is so completely stared and scowled out of countenance that she scarcely ever summons the courage to repeat the visit.

And this is the Christian religion, from a promulgation of which tens of thousands (imbeciles and hypocrites among the rest) draw their support, largely from the ignorant, the poor, and the credulous—denouncing those who withhold contributions as infidels and Atheists; betraying, by word and deed, a spirit which, if unrestrained by law, would deprive them of citizenship, and, in this nineteenth century, re-enact the scenes of the Spanish Inquisition! Indicative of such a spirit is the prevailing struggle among Christian fanatics to insert the name of God, and recognize the divinity of Jesus in our Federal Constitution.

It is true that our modern theologians are not responsible for the origin of this theological "imposition," for we find that, anterior to the Genesal creation, men had their objects of worship, each nation establishing or creating its own god. Gods of gold, silver, brass, wood, stone, and clay; gods of the animal and reptile creation, such as bulls, elephants, crocodiles, and serpents. Planetary and elementary gods, such as the sun, moon, stars, and fire, and water, and, at a later day, man-gods. The Hindoos had their Christ, or Christna, born of a Virgin, as was the Christian's Christ, without a natural father, and like him put to death, long before the latter was born. Hence, it was only necessary for the Christian fathers to copy the Hindoo legend, with such additions and alterations as would better adapt it to the people and times, leaving their successors in the faith such merit as they might win in the labor of spreading the monstrous deception throughout all the earth.

All nations above the savage have their own bibles and their own gods, shaped in accordance with the will and desires of their authors. The American aborigines, without a Bible, worshiped the Great Spirit; and until brought into communication with the Christian world, were among the most honest, trustworthy, and conscientious of all living men. No locks or bars were required to their wigwams. Murders were of rare occurrence; drunkenness was unknown; and unlike their Christian successors in the land, they ranked seduction and licentiousness among the highest crimes—ordinarily inflicting upon the male offender the penalty of death! But no sooner were these so-called "savages" brought to a knowledge of the Christian religion, than they became deceitful, treacherous, and dishonest—becoming robbers and murderers, as we find them at the present day. And now, of all the numerous worshipers in the world the Christians alone claim the atonement for original sin, and, with a few exceptions, the existence of an endless hell. Is it not marvelously strange that God, after depositing Adam in the dust where he left him, and afterwards manifesting himself to numbers of bible notables—speaking to Moses face to face, giving him his laws and commandments, which he was forty days and nights in writing—is it not strange, I repeat, after all this, that God nowhere alluded to the original sin, the fall of man, a coming Savior, or future state of existence? Why was it that he withheld this knowledge, so important to man, when being so voluble and communicative in matters of less importance? Was it an after-thought, that he might amuse himself by a contemplation of the pain and shrieks of his helpless children, whom he had circumvented by his fore-knowledge, that they might writhe and roast in an endless hell; or is the whole plan of salvation a scheme that is totally unworthy of belief?

I know that I have made use of strong language, but have not gone beyond an expression of my firm convictions. I have, therefore, no apology to offer to any one. I cherish no ill feelings toward our clergy; on the contrary, I consider them in the light of other charlatans and astute speculators, who earn their bread and butter by imposing upon the credulity of the ignorant and unthinking masses. Many of them are entitled to no small degree of credit for their sagacity, for it is an acknowledged fact that the greater and more mysterious the humbug is, the more greedily the people swallow it.

But I dare not, being merely human, condemn any of their tenets or creeds, as all claim their origin in a greater or less degree, from the gods themselves. The Chinese, the Hindoo, the Brahmins, and the Buddhists; the Greeks and the Jews; the Christians; the followers of Mahomet, and the believers in other creeds and dogmas—all claim divine origin; and who am I that I should condemn them, although my right to study, question, and investigate is as great as the right of the greatest?

But it is contended that the Christian doctrine is the entire embodiment of peace and good-will on earth to man. The contrary is the fact; and I challenge the Christian world to deny that its teachings have been the cause of more bloodshed, misery, tears, and suffering during the Christian era, than all other causes combined. Our standard histories declare that over one hundred millions of human lives have been sacrificed as the direct result of its teachings. But this terrible loss of human life our clergy profess to be able to explain away: "if they only had time!" Years and decades have resolved themselves into centuries, and yet we are without the explanation!

While I do not condemn any religion or mode of honest worship, I claim it as a right and as my duty to criticise all, and if I can, to expose their frauds, their errors, and their impositions. I would not be understood as denying a great "First Cause,"—a spirit incomprehensible, full of power, goodness and glory; but I do deny that he is the author of the Christian religion, or is in any manner responsible for the bloodshed, terror, and misery that may be put down as its legitimate outgrowth. He has, in his wisdom, fixed laws for our government, and to a violation of them we may trace all our physical and mental ills and sufferings. Where is the man or woman that does not suffer from wrong-doing, both in body and mind? Where is the murderer, the thief, the liar, the swindler, and hypocrite that is at peace with his own conscience? Consider the effects of physical excesses and imprudence?

How many thousands suffer from a violation of nature's laws? Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the ills to which humanity is subjected, may be ascribed to that cause; and the only atonement is through suffering. It is true that there are many who suffer from hereditary transmission, and hence the truism that "The sins of the father (let me add the mother, too), shall descend even unto the third generation." It is also true that there are exceptions which we cannot comprehend; but all arise out of the same cause—the transgression of nature's laws. But, where is the man or woman who has lived an upright, honest life, and conformed as nearly as possible to the laws of his or her being, who does not enjoy that peace of mind so essential to human happiness? We may, at times, be at a loss for an explanation of the evils that beset us; but upon close examination the cause will be found within ourselves; and prayers, unless seconded by individual effort will avail us nothing.

In conclusion let me say that all owe it to themselves to use the reasoning powers their creator has endowed them with, to improve themselves, to search, seek, and examine for themselves, and not to rely upon the ipse dixit of any man, be he scripture-monger, salvation-peddler, saint or sinner—ever bearing in mind that every individual writes his own destiny, and that that destiny cannot be changed by all the cant and prayers of all the popes, bishops, priests, deacons, and elders that ever lived on earth;—that everybody is responsible for himself alone, and that no mediation can shield him from the penalty of his own misdeeds. Let none flatter themselves that they are exceptions; let no one rely upon the efficacy of Church ordinances or the prayers of hired priests, for death is not surer than that each and every one of us must answer for himself. As we can neither add to nor detract from the greatness of the Almighty, or change or modify his laws, all our prayers and petitions, our praise and adoration will avail us nothing. We can most effectively serve him by an observance of "The Golden Rule," laid down for us long before the advent of Christ, and reiterated by him as an explicit, and even god-like rule of conduct—to "Do unto others as we would have them do unto us." Do this; relieve our fellow-creatures, and render them as happy as we can, and the mission of our lives will be happily fulfilled.

Wherein does it benefit the impoverished man or woman to address the Ruler of the Universe in song and systematic prayer, in the hope that, suspending his laws, he will shower down bread from heaven, and send beefsteak upon the winds, as he sent myriads of quail to his chosen people of Israel? Would it not be wiser and more consistent in us to thank him for the blessings that enable us to relieve the necessities of the poor and unfortunate—to supply their needs from our abundance, thereby rendering ourselves his "good angels,"—diffusing light and bringing happiness among our fellow-creatures, where, else, all had been darkness, misery, and distress.

OPEN QUESTIONS.—It is a great mistake to consider any question respecting man's condition after death, or the personal identity of invisible intelligences as settled. This is a foregone conclusion in Christianity, and had the mystic rap of the nineteenth century only commenced in the pulpit, it would have been hailed as a miraculous confirmation of Christian dogmatism. Let Spiritualists, therefore, be slow in building theories on mystical phenomena, lest they become like Christians, who are spell-bound by "faith in the Bible." To be crystalized in settled opinions respecting the unknown, is proscriptive and sectarian, as all believers in mediumistic "revelations" are prone to become.

The Law of Compensation.

The soul, that sins, dies—such is the Law. Cause and Effect run parallel through every fibre of our being—through the Universe.

High on the list of Beatitudes, is the Beatitude which enables us to see God—the Living God, in Living Temples—enables us not only to see God—It enables us to be Living Temples of the Living God.

In my circle of acquaintance, are those to whom I reverently bow.—To my perception, they are the personification—the Materialization—of the Living God—the Power of God and the Wisdom of God—the Power of God, enabling them to preserve their form erect, through all strains upon their integrity—the Wisdom of God, directing their every action, word and thought.

Though deeply religious, I'm too materialistic to adore abstractions.

was claimed that he was "in the beginning with God;" that he existed from all eternity; that he took upon himself the form of man; that he was the "word"—the son of God; that he was the second person in the trinity; that he could control the elements; that he could walk in the air; that he could move any bodies at will; that he raised the dead; that he came to redeem the world from sin; that he was the world's "Savior," "Redeemer," and "the only begotten of the Father," and that through his name the world was to be saved.

Numerous other "Saviors" and "Redeemers," who lived before Christ, might be named in this connection to show the striking similarity which existed between him and them, but we have already quoted enough to give the reader clearly to understand that there were, hundreds of years before the time of Jesus, abundance of material of which to spin and weave his story; and that taking all the facts into consideration, the prior existence of similar claims, and the extreme doubt of the authenticity of the gospel narratives of Christ, the strongest probability is that such a personage as Jesus never had an existence; or that, if he did exist, he was only a common mortal, to whom, a century or two after his death, was falsely attributed by designing, dishonest persons, deific characteristics, impossible performances, and moral utterances, after the style of the fabulous demi-gods and distinguished teachers of older times.

For the Love of God.

"The time is coming when Christians will love God so intensely that they will put to death even their own children who may be found holding and teaching heretical opinions."—Rev. Mr. Wells, Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of Northern Ohio.

Perhaps our readers will remember the reply to "A Pious Letter," which recently appeared in these columns, by Morgan R. Nichols, West Winfield, N. Y. We have just learned that this worthy young man, after having been refused admittance to the W. W. Academy by the Principal, has been obliged to leave his father's house because of his Liberal belief. The pious parent of young Nichols obliged him to accept the alternative of destroying his books, giving up his claim in a Liberal library, and renouncing his honest convictions of truth, or else to leave his home. He has chosen to give up his father's house rather than surrender his manhood. This Christian father is doubtless longing for the "good time coming" predicted by Wells.

THE subject of money is the most distasteful to us of any topic we are called upon to allude to. We dislike to be obliged to mention it; but we just wish to say, that if our patrons who have not renewed will be kind enough to do so, they will confer a special favor upon us. Our expenses are heavy and "funds" are necessary to meet them. Friends, remember our needs. We again request those who do not want the paper and do not intend to pay for it, to pay up for the time they have had it and notify us to stop it. We wish to furnish all who want it and will pay for it, but cannot afford to send it to those who will not pay.

A NEW BOOK.—Mr. C. P. Somerby has presented us with a copy of Scriptural Speculations, by Halsey R. Stevens, a work of over 400 pages, just issued. It is a review of many parts of the Bible from a Liberal standpoint, and presents many new thoughts as well as old thoughts in a new dress. It is an interesting work, and can be freely recommended to the general reader. Price $2 by mail.

ZELL'S ENCYCLOPEDIA. We call attention to the advertisement of this valuable work on the fifteenth page. We lately treated ourselves to a copy of the work, and are well pleased with it. It contains not only all the matter in "Webster's Unabridged Dictionary," but is also a full Repository of Knowledge, Science, Biography, Literature and Art. It is truly one of the most valuable works in the English language.

THE valuable work, The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion, by ex-Rev. E. E. Guild, which, for several months past has appeared regularly in our columns, will be completed in our next, after which it will be published in book form, both in paper and cloth. Those who will wish copies, will please notify us. Price, in paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Freethought Lecture.

A lecture was delivered at Masonic Hall, last Sunday evening, by Alfred S. Green, entitled "Freethought and Freethinkers." There was a fair attendance, and the lecture was well received. Mr. Green desires to go West, and will fill any engagement that may be desired. His list of prepared lectures is to be found in another column.

We cheerfully give place to the following from Father Beeson on the Indian subject. We have had several interviews with the kindly old gentleman (over seventy years of age), and find him thoroughly honest and in earnest. He has afforded us new light upon the Indian question. The course our government and our people have pursued towards the red men has assuredly been most dishonest and cruel. Every treaty we have made with them has been broken on our part, and in the work of aggression we have always been foremost. If we had, in all cases, treated the sons of the forest in the way which honesty and humanity would dictate, it would have been vastly better for the Indians, and more than $500,000,000 in the public treasury. Father Beeson has spent twenty years in Oregon, and has become thoroughly acquainted with various tribes of Indians, as well as the numerous wrongs that have been done them.

An Open Letter

To the Pastors of all Denominations, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States for 1875-6.

GENTLEMEN: One hundred years have nearly gone since our fathers declared that all men (women included) have a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and yet, to-day, the women, and the Indians, and the ill-paid working men are, either by prejudice or by poverty, debarred from the enjoyment of these rights. This sad fact is an appeal for you to unite, as with the heart of one man, to remove the obstacles, and thus prove by the equality of rights, instead of by the partiality for riches, that our nation is worthy of the day which, for the hundredth time, we are about to celebrate, and in order to impress you, as the national representatives of Religion and Law, with the necessity for special action, a statement is herewith given of what needs to be done, and the names of representative men (deceased and living) who have by their sympathy and pecuniary aid sanctioned the subscriber in this work:

The late Archbishop Hughes, and Father Desmit,	Catholics.
The late Rev. Dr. Wayland, President of Brown University,	Baptist.
The late Rev. Theodore Parker, and Thomas Starr King,	Unitarians.
The late Rev. Dr. Kirk, President of the American	Tract Society.
Bishop Clark, Providence, R. I.,	Episcopal.
Rev. H. Crosby, Chancellor of the New York University,	Presbyterian.
Rev. Dr. Abel Stevens, New York,	Methodist.
Benjamin Tatham, New York,	Orthodox Friend.
Delwyn Parrish, Philadelphia,	Hicksite Friend.
Rev. Dr. Minor, Boston,	Universalist.
Luther Colby, Editor Banner of Light ,	Spiritualist.
Horace Seaver, Editor Boston Investigator ,	Infidel.
The late Gen. John E. Wool, Gerrit Smith, Hon. Wm. Sprague, Peter Cooper, R. T. Trall, M. D., Bronson Murray,	Citizens.

In addition to these, the subscriber has received donations from the "Boston Unitarian Association for the spread of the gospel among the Indians;" he has also spoken in scores of pulpits, and has been kindly spoken of, almost without exception, by the local Press at every place he has visited.

WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED.

Prior to 1860 several Indian Aid Associations were formed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Massachusetts, all of which did much to attract public attention to the outrages upon the Indians, which resulted in the appointment of successive Commissions of investigation—the first by President Lincoln, secretly to ascertain if the reports which he had heard were true. In due time the Commission returned, and confirmed the worst reports he had previously received, showing that the Minnesota Indian raid, in which hundreds of whites were killed, was occasioned by the robbery of $500,000 of the Indians' money, for the want of which they were driven by starvation and the influence of the rebels to seek redress by force of arms, the same as the whites were doing. This report could not at that time receive the attention which its importance required, and since then it cannot be found on the records of the Indian Bureau, although diligent search has been made; but the subscriber received—in regard to it—the following note:

"MY AGED FRIEND BEESON: I have heard your statement. I have thought much, though I have said little, but I assure you that as soon as the business of this war is settled, the Indians shall have my first attention, and I shall not rest until they have justice that will satisfy both them and you."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The second Commission was organized under President Johnson, and reported the necessity of an immediate radical reform in the Indian Department.

The third Commission was organized as "the Indian Peace Commission," in accordance with the resolve of President Grant, "to facilitate any measure for the Christian civilization of the Indians." It was composed of twenty distinguished citizens and pastors, who engaged to act without pay from the Government. Vincent Colyer and others of its members visited the various tribes, and their reports fully sustained the appropriateness of the following extract from a published appeal of the Commission, dated July 16th, 1868:

"We do not deny that the Indian is an uncivilized man, and that his practices toward his enemies are cruel and revolting, but we affirm that, to civilize and not to destroy, is the noble policy of a magnanimous nation. We, moreover, affirm that his cruelties are exaggerated by the cunning of interested whites who, themselves, with all their enlightenment, often rival the Indian in deeds of blood." "Public opinion has been fed with falsehood, until not only sympathy, but even common justice, has been well nigh extinguished. Taking advantage of this condition of the public mind, hordes of speculators prey upon the Indians with impunity." "As there is a God, this evil must be stopped, or its guilt be visited upon our land; it is dangerous, as well as mean and cowardly, to oppress the weak." "We appeal to our fellow-citizens from Maine to California, to feel their responsibility in this matter, as well as their power to reverse the sad and shameful picture. We ask them to help us by mass-meetings, and by the voice of the free Press in every city and town."

In behalf of the Commission.

HOWARD CROSBY, President,
PETER COOPER, Vice-President,
BENJAMIN TATHAM, Treasurer,
VINCENT COLYER, Secretary.

WILLIAM BLODGET,
LE GRAND CANNON,
EDWARD CROMWELL, } Executive Committee.

To this earnest appeal there has not as yet been any proper response from the pulpits, and as the Indian Ring is paramount over religion and law, the Peace Commission remains powerless to stop frauds and Modoc tragedies. Some of its members have resigned rather than retain a sacred office as a useless sham, but the good results of their work are apparent in a rapidly increasing interest and in the readiness of the leading newspapers to plead for the oppressed. It is also seen in the fact that the Indians, who have no faith in Government officials, still hope for justice from the people at large.

And now, gentlemen, as you and your predecessors in office, from the landing of our Fathers on Plymouth Rock, until now, have had the command of the army and of the national treasury, and the moral force of all the churches, and have failed to prevent Christian civilization from being a blight instead of a blessing upon our Indian neighbors, and a bar against the enjoyment of equal rights of all classes. There is no faith felt by any party in your sectarianisms or in your politics. You are, therefore not asked for the enactment of new laws, or for fresh measures on the old plan, but only that you will learn the lesson which was taught by the ancient version of "a great sheet let down from heaven containing all manner of living creatures," (symbolic of different creeds,) that the Indian's faith in the Great Spirit is as acceptable to God as your own, and that faith of any kind is worthless, except there is added to it virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and above all, "charity which thinketh no evil, is not easily provoked, and which suffereth long and is kind."

For this end, you, with all who read this, are invited (in advance) to consider the decisions of a two days' meeting, which will be called as soon as representative persons (men and women) have signed their names to a call for the following purposes:

1. To ascertain the reason why Christian civilization is so h a lamentable failure.
2. To adopt a Platform which shall embody a provision for the enjoyment of the natural rights of all persons, regardless of color, grade or sex.
3. To nominate a President of the United States, whose rightly-formed head and well-ordered previous life shall be a sufficient guarantee of fitness for the office.

Gentlemen, in full confidence that, to the extent of your love for God and for your neighbor, and for your country, you will contribute your money and your influence in some well-devised plan which shall actualize "Peace on earth, good-will to man," and "glad tidings of great joy unto all people" (Indians included).

Those having suggestions to make, touching the foregoing, will please address the subscriber.

JOHN BEESON,
Cooper Institute, N. Y.

To the Readers of The Truth Seeker:

DEAR FRIENDS: Permit me to address you on a subject that I think should to some extent interest every person of Infidel or Liberal principles. You are all well aware that religious literature is circulated extensively through the medium of traveling agents, missionaries or colporteurs. The Southern States are, perhaps, more infested with these godly-drummers than the Northern States; I can speak positively for the State of South Carolina, which is almost deluged with these religious pimps, traveling through the country selling bibles, distributing Sunday-school and other tracts, soliciting subscriptions to the various religious newspapers published in this and adjoining States, visiting sections remote from railroad facilities, and carrying their gospel right to the doors of their customers. Many of these gospel drummers are doing a thriving business, both for themselves and their great cause. Now can't we Liberals profit by this Christian example; have we not an equal cause, yea, a much greater cause to be up and doing? Can we not afford one Infidel missionary, just one, whose business shall be to travel and sell Liberal books, distribute Liberal tracts and solicit subscribers to our newspapers, viz.: THE TRUTH SEEKER, Common Sense, Boston Investigator, or any other Infidel publication?

There are in our country thousands of people of Liberal views and Infidel principles, who never saw or read an Infidel book or paper; in fact, there are many who do not know that there are any such books and papers published in the United States, and the clergy are doing their "level best" to keep this bit of information fenced out and ignorance fenced in.

There are a great many persons who are skeptical in regard to the Bible and the Christian religion; but who—as I said before—never read an Infidel book or paper in their lives. The most of these people would buy a book and subscribe to a paper from a traveling agent, but will never do either by ordering them direct from the publishers or book stores. I have for the last three years been strongly impressed with the importance of this subject, and have often wished that some one more competent than myself would give it a public notice, hoping that some one might engage in the business; but never until recently did I think of trying it myself, but circumstances of a peculiar nature have determined me to "try my hand."

I propose to commence the business on or about the first of Jan., 1876. If I succeed in my plans, I propose to canvass the States of South Carolina, Georgia, North Carolina and Tennessee, and sell Infidel books, pamphlets, tracts, etc., also to solicit subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Common Sense, and any other Liberal paper from which I can obtain an agency. I see but one drawback to my enterprise, that is the lack of money. It is true it will not require a large sum to set this ball in motion, still it requires more than I can command; and unless I can get help I must give it up. I have already obtained a little and have the promise of a little more, and have had encouraging words from some of my Infidel friends, advising me to push the thing through at once. I do not by any means wish any person to bestow or contribute anything gratuitously, I only wish to borrow funds sufficient to start me in the business, and pledge myself to refund every cent twelve months after date with 10 per cent interest; any one who may feel disposed to aid me can do so by depositing the amount they wish to loan me with the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, (Dr. Bennett) or Col. R. Peterson, Editor of Common Sense, when the name of the loaner and the amount loaned and the date it was received shall all appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER or Common Sense, as the case may be; and as soon as a sufficient sum is deposited to start me in the business, due notice will be given, and each person will receive my promissory note for the amount they deposited before it is paid over to me. I suppose it will take about 300 or 350 dollars to start me. Say a good horse or mule, which will cost in this State $150; a suitable wagon, $125; a set of harness and other fixtures, $35; advertising, $40; total, $350.

This is a small amount, but small as it is I have not got it. If all who are able, would each loan me twenty-five cents, I would soon have the "ark moving," and I believe, stirring up Freethought element that can be reached in no other way.

Friends of the Liberal cause, Brothers and Sisters of humanity, my project is before you; shall I have your support or not? I am poor, but willing to work and devote the rest of my life to the great struggle for mental freedom, and notwithstanding I am ostracised here in this priest-ridden, superstitious community, I am still in during the war, pay or no pay.

Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.
Pendleton, S. C., Sept. 17th, 1875.

DR. BETHUNE used to tell a good story about two Scotchmen who came to this country several years ago. "What's the matter, Andrew, that ye seem sae troubled this morning?" "I had a fearful dream in the night." "What did ye dream?" "I dinna like to tell." "Did ye dream ye saw the deil?" "No, it was far waur than that." "Did ye dream yer mither was dead?" "Nay, it was far waur than that." "Well, what did ye dream?" "Why, I dream-ed I was hame again."

Labor the Grand Criterion.

BY A. GAYLORD SPAULDING.

To the Grangers and Toilers of the Nation:

BROTHERS AND SISTERS: You all know, and everybody knows, that labor creates, sustains, and preserves everything—earns and deserves all. Who but Labor, then, personified, should be voted king of the Cannibal Islands, or Emperor, Czar, Khedive, Mikado, Kaiser, President, Governor, or Chief, of any State or Nation? Nothing else is at all worthy to stand at the helm, to represent the people in any capacity. It is always the high mark and standard, measure, value, proof, and test, of true manhood, morals, and intellect, everywhere. Brains are soft, if not hardened up by labor. Hands are puny, when not made brown, tough, rough, and bony, by toil and sweat. Soft brains and puny hands are wasting moths that ruin the whole country. Let them be arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to

EVERLASTING BANISHMENT AND INFAMY.

Labor is the mysterious alchemy or philosopher's stone, that turns everything to gold—or bread, which is better; and all non-producing professionals, speculators, shirks and vampires, are thieves and robbers, who deserve the fate of the grasshopper, for they live on plunder. Labor is health and wealth, and should be the pride and boast of every man and woman. Labor is heavenly, and fills the world with plenty, beauty and perfection—with fair distribution and equal rights. The Grange Movement gives labor notable prominence and distinction, and it is now what will become of the reigning monarchs of the earth—the autocrats, dictators, and despots—the Rothschilds and money kings? They have forfeited their proud claims to rule, and must therefore abdicate. Such a tender, slender, weak-nerved, non-working crew! Their high positions are a mere assumption and chance possession. Labor is now the mighty watchword, and workingmen demand the thrones and chairs of state, with women for prime ministers and cabinet officers. No army can put them down, because they themselves are the army imperium in imperio. Reason, justice, and the welfare of mankind are on their side. It is an evolution and a revolution. Our government will rise up at the great centennial of 1876, when Grant will slide gracefully out, and the people march quietly in. No more Cæsarism, or third-termism. This is the new era of Labor, which is the burden of fervent prayers, sermons and songs, on Sunday or week-day—always sacred. And what is the great secret of such a marvelous consummation? It is simply the blessed effect of the showered so copiously on the candid minds of the working class. How speedily and easily it all comes about. But yesterday all slaves—to-day all free men and women! Let us have a grand jubilee—a universal celebration of the splendid victory and triumph of down-trodden labor. All hands up and banners waving!

A WORLD QUESTION,

Labor was the high college of Benjamin Franklin, Abraham Lincoln, and Farmer Taylor of Wisconsin, graduating in the distinguished Freshmen and Sophomore ranks of the heroic type-setter, rail-splitter, and sod-turner. It is the noble school of COMMON LABOR AND COMMON SENSE.

And will not Common Sense make a good president, governor, representative, or constable? Didn't Lincoln answer middling well at the head? Such a diploma, then, stands far above your popular fancy qualifications of classic pride. So what now becomes of your West Point epaulets and shoulder-straps, or your Grants, Shermans and Sheridans? Bosh! Suppose a man did kill Cock Robin, Little Crow or Jeff Davis? Does that make him an angel, or a man any more deserving your votes? No; it is a terrible delusion of the great foolish, numbskull world. Really the honest marks and scars and sun-tan of productive labor are far higher commendations than any bloodstains of human slaughter, because labor feeds the people, while war starves them to death. Labor represents the masses, while military and professional titles and honors are monopolized by the few, and furnish bread to none.

A national Congress of political, and professional idlers, loafers, gamblers, thieves, speculators, whiskey guzzlers and whoremongers, is an awful burlesque and disgrace; and if such men are supposed to represent the working class, they (the workers) must be low indeed! But they do no such thing. They are "another breed of pups" entirely, and working men are blinded and cheated all around most shamefully.

Again, right here at home, it is reported that our Minnesota legislators, during their last session (60 days) expended ten thousand dollars for the nice little luxuries of

TOBACCO, CIGARS AND LIQUORS,

(to say nothing of other nameless vices and indulgences). The same complimentary facts are probably more or less true of every other State, showing our deplorably demoralized condition as a nation. All this, remember, is a continual outrage imposed on universal labor—for labor pays every cent. Who can wonder at the hard times, or that we are not totally eaten up and demolished by human vultures, in the humbug name of such government and legislation?

Under this most dubious and discouraging aspect of things, our only consolation and hope rest in the confident belief that there is yet a balm in Gilead. That healing balm and physician is the inherent power and virtue of labor and the laboring class. And, if such rottenness, recklessness, wickedness and corruption, are the legitimate outgrowth and fruit of non-productive speculation, and of professional and political, and money aristocracy, in State and Church, surely the downfall of our republic is but a question of time, unless averted by wise and timely reform. It is well that we are awakening to the threatened danger. Light among the workers, with general industrial co-operation, only can save the ship.

LABOR AND TEMPERANCE.

Enlightened co-operative labor is a mighty lever to elevate and reform society, because labor itself naturally produces steady habits and sober minds. And without general co-operative labor reform, it is a question if political temperance agitation is not wasted and useless. An expensive campaign is necessarily limited, and soon terminates for lack of funds. When, if such efforts and money were devoted to the work of organizing labor, temperance reform would extend and prosper on no ephemeral or fictitious basis. Combine the two, then, with labor at the bottom, and save your wasted time, breath and shoe-leather. Labor reform is the great panacea. What say you, temperance friends?

LABOR AND RELIGION

belong together, because practical religion makes labor an essential element and duty. Without it, religion becomes aristocratic and priestly, and a mere empty Sunday affair of speculative theology. That will never do for the Grange. Labor tames and civilizes men, as well as horses, and when organized and co-operative, no school is better for mental, moral and social training. Then the Grange becomes a real church of reform, with labor for its religion, for the people's salvation. Jesus was a working man (according to Bible authority)—a Sovereign—a Granger, cradled in a manger. His badge, or regalia, was a carpenter's apron. No monarch's crown, nor priestly robe; no Sunday form nor gilded steeple, but universal unity, humanity and brotherhood. How different from modern sectism.

The Car of Time is Moving.

On, the car of time is moving.
Ever moving on the way
Towards that bourne where sleep the ages,
In the silence of decay,
And from out whose gloomy portals
Comes no love-note, sign or token;
Nought to cheer us in life's wanderings,
Since the silver cord was broken.

Yet some tell us, in the future
We shall meet those gone before,
In a land where youth and beauty,
As in youth, bloom evermore;
Rising higher by progression,
Knowledge gaining to the soul;
Upward, onward and forevermore
The car of progress rolls.

Strange to me are such wild fancies,
Stranger still the world of man,
With its learning, science, knowledge,
Dare not life's great problem scan;
Try to make each other happy,
Raise the fallen from the dust,
Feed the hungry, help the needy,
And in God no longer trust.

Life's great duty is before us,
Here to labor, "do or die."
Heedless of a God eternal.
Or of mansions in the sky;
Seeking out the sorrow-laden,
Cheer their hearts with words of love;
Give them bread, or cash to buy it—
Not a check for worlds above.

'Tis not in the laws of nature—
All in wealth can equal be;
Some are poor by laws inherent,
Like the channels to the sea;
Each one are by laws of being
Doomed life's channel to pursue,
Whether rough, smooth or pleasant,
Mine's for me, and yours for you.

But to all we owe a duty,
Let us then perform it well;
Clear the thorns from out their pathway—
Not for heaven or fear of hell,
But to make the heart beat quicker,
By the aid we can bestow;
Help the needy, raise the fallen,
Make our heaven on earth below.

Dry Goods Price-List.

Thousands in the country are constantly debating the question of prices in dry goods. They go to the most popular store in the neighborhood, and fail there to learn for a certainty whether fair prices are charged or not. Other thousands are not only seeking honest and fair prices, but they want also reliable information in regard to the styles of goods most in demand. Now, all such persons should send a letter to the highly respectable and reliable firm of M. Altman & Co., and ask for their new Price-list. This enterprising and well-known dry goods firm have taken this method of popularizing their business in every section of country. This Price-list, containing thirty-two pages of closely printed matter, gives a minute description of a $250,000 stock of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Millinery Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Furnishing Goods, Ladies' and Children's Under-garments, Costumes, Cloaks, Basques, Hosiery, Gloves, Jewelry, Laces, Trimmings, Parasols, Umbrellas, Notions and the thousand and one articles usually sold in first-class city houses. It will be sent, free of cost, to any one sending address and postage stamp for mailing the same.

We have examined this Price-list, and find that it teaches its readers how to order goods. The description it gives of every article is so perfect and complete as to make the selection extremely easy and certain of giving satisfaction. This firm will give their best attention to the execution of all orders, and they agree to refund the money in every case where the goods turn out different from their representations. The standing of the house is such that we cheerfully vouch for the truth of whatever they say. Address M. ALTMAN & Co., corner 6th avenue and 19th street, New York.—EDITOR INDEPENDENT.

[We know and have known Mr. Altman and his manner of doing business for some time, and are fully enabled to endorse the views of our contemporary, and although we seldom agree in matters theological, we are pleased to accord our hearty concurrence with its judgment in reference to our friend MORRIS ALTMAN. He is just getting out his new Fall and Winter Price-list, containing accurate descriptions and the lowest price of House-furnishing Goods, such as Sheetings, Towels, Blankets, Quilts, etc., as well as his full assortment of Ladies' Suits, made up in the latest styles in Alpaca, Poplins, Repps, Merinos, Cashmere Silks, Camel's Hair Goods, etc.; etc., as low as $10 each, and as high up as $300.

This Price-list is sent free to all our readers who may send a stamp and their address, and to those hesitating, or who may be unable to send stamp, he will furnish the Price-list free upon their sending in their address. Mr. Altman is also anxious that Liberals who may send for his Price-list should distribute them freely in their towns and villages.—ED. T. S.]

TURKS BETTER THAN CHRISTIANS.—Nothing has surprised me more than the contrast this city presents to most European and American cities in the way of temperance. Wine and stimulants are forbidden in the Koran, and coffee is the universal drink everywhere. At all the scalas or steamboat landings on the Bosphorus, nothing but coffee—Turkish coffee—is to be had for drink at the numerous restaurants that line its banks. A party of English, returning from Egypt, spent a day in steamboat, viewing the sights. They told me they made diligent search for something to drink, but could not obtain even a glass of beer—nothing but coffee. In Pera, on the opposite side of the Horn, the European section, occasionally, though rarely, a restaurant may be found where wines, and liquors are sold. This may, perhaps, be accounted for in part from the fact that no one can sell without a license, and licenses are very high.

Tobacco chewing seems to be unknown here; I have not seen an instance since I have been here, nor a spittoon; but smoking is universal. Cigars are rarely seen, and common pipes never. Europeans and Americans use cigarettes, and these are made up as occasion demands. For this purpose they carry a small box containing small strips of paper, made of wood for this use, and fine-cut tobacco, with which they roll up one or more cigarettes as wanted, insert in an amber tube, and all is done save lighting. Easy as this seems, it requires skill of manipulation. They are very delicate; are not offensive to ladies, who permit them in their reception rooms as a matter of course. The Turk, if at home, smokes his chibouque, which is a wooden tube six feet long, with amber tip at one end, and an earthen bowl at the other, resting in a polished brass saucer upon the floor. If he is at a restaurant he smokes the narghili, the apparatus for which there abounds. This machine is composed of a flexible tube, one inch in diameter and two yards long, attached with brass mountings to a large glass urn or bottle, partly filled with water, and so constructed that the smoke is all forced through the water to be cooled and purified. In actual consumption of tobacco, the Americans, in smoking alone (to say nothing of chewing), far exceed this people, and also every other I have seen.—From a Constantinople Letter.

New-York Liberal Club.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 17TH.

[THREE HUNDRED AND ELEVENTH MEETING.]

A paper was read by G. L. HENDERSON, entitled,

Freethought in the West.

Freethought in the West was suggested to me as a subject which would be of interest to those who compose both the membership and the audience of the Liberal Club. I have lived in the West since 1846, when Chicago was but a village, and not a mile of railroad existed. The telegraph poles were still growing undisturbed in the tamarack swamps; the brick and stone school-houses, court-houses and churches, now to be found everywhere in this great valley, were then reposing in their argillaceous and rocky beds. Civilization had not then kindled the sacred fire of the brick-maker, nor sharpened the chisel of the stone-cutter. The red man had not then relinquished the hope that his prayer to the Great Spirit would be heard, and that the war-whoop and scalping-knife would yet strike terror to the heart of the pale faced invader, who, to save his scalp, would flee toward the rising sun, and leave him to practice the virtues and acts of his ancestors, which consisted mostly in keeping his wives well whipped, his dogs well fed, and his own body beautifully painted; and, like his European brother, he relieved the monotony of existence, and also pleased the gods, by occasionally burning a captive, whose crime was, first, that of being captured, and second, that he was born a Pawnee instead of a Sioux. But do not shed a single tear for the fate of the Pawnee, for I can assure you that had the Sioux been the captive, the Pawnee god would not have been deprived of the luxury of a roasted Sioux.

In 1846 I found myself transferred from a populous European city to a western wilderness, whose principal attraction consisted in the unsurpassed fertility of its soil, and in the unlimited scope for its possession and occupancy. Nature is said to abhor a vacuum, and Civilization, with its myriad eyes, is searching it out, and from its fruitful womb hastens to fill it. The Briton, the German, the Scandinavian, the Celtic races of France, Italy, and Ireland, even the remote Russian, all pressed toward this new Eldorado.

This heterogeneous multitude are all in search of happiness. Happiness is dependent upon two things: First, space for the person; second, space for the personality. Like the forest tree he must not only have liberty to stand but he must have liberty to swing his arms around him as the tree waves its branches in the wind. Unlike the tree, the man has legs, and they desire to move and to run, and he must be permitted to use both. But in addition to arms and legs he has a stomach; an omnivorous stomach, and he must be permitted to gather nuts, hunt in forest and prairie for beasts, and dig in the earth for food. In addition to the organs of locomotion and digestion, he possesses a brain. It, too, is an insatiable devourer. It keeps constantly at work two faithful servants—the eye and the ear—and they must be permitted to traverse the whole earth, and search the unlimited abyss of the starry heavens, for food. As the mouth is the inlet to the stomach for undigested food, so the tongue is the outlet for the digested material of the brain. Thus the person requires space for his body, food for his stomach, thought for his brain; in other words, to be happy he must move, eat, and think.

The immortal John Milton says: "Of all rights, give me the right to speak, to think, and to speak freely what I think." Here he but once asserts his right to think, while he twice asserts his right to speak. And there is good reason for this demand. Every despot well knows that if he can silence the tongue, paralysis of the brain will soon follow. Nowhere in all the world's past history has there been found these three adjuncts of civilization, so admirably combined, as in the Mississippi Valley, viz: space, food, and matter for thought.

The winters in the North-Western states are quite severe. The absence of forests allows the cold winds an uninterrupted sweep; and the absence of timber is the result of the uninterrupted sweeps of the annual and inevitable prairie fire which comes at times slowly over mountain and valley, like the rolling waves of a sea in a moderate gale. At other times it comes roaring and crackling through the tall grass with the speed of an Arabian steed, devouring every shrub and everything that lives, except the rodent, who hides in the earth, or the swift-footed deer, who during this season are seldom found far from a friendly river. These same winds serve a double purpose: in summer they keep the air pure and free from malaria; in the winter they seek out every crack and cranny of the human dwelling, and compel the occupant to provide in summer against the severity of the winter. The climatic conditions of this region preclude the possibility of contracting bronchial affections. Persons of a consumptive tendency are generally benefited by a residence here.

Al! but you should see what a breeze is raised when the conflict of the creeds begins. The priest seldom appears as an actor in the great drama until there is grain in the barn, eggs in the hen-house, and beef in the barrel, and by that time the sheep have wandered from the fold, and when the shepherd comes they know his voice no more, and may decline to part with their fleece. The song of Zion is no more caroled by faithful lips.

"Come ye sinners, poor and needy."

But the song of the self-reliant man, whose reason stands at the helm is:

"Ring out the old; ring in the new;

And let every man paddle his own canoe."

This is a poor country for doctors and priests; what few there are wear poor clothes and visit their patients and their flocks either on foot or behind a horse so thin that its shadow would attract less notice than the virtues of a congressman.

On my first settlement in Winnebago county, Ill., in 1847, I found a mixed community of Irish Catholics, Scotch Presbyterians, German and Norwegian Lutherans, and Eastern Yankees of every creed, from the Baptist, ready to follow his Lord through the water, to the Adventist Saint, ready to follow him through the air as soon as the "Anatomy of a Feather" should lead to the discovery of the true method of constructing a substantial pair of wings. Till then the prudent followers of Miller plod along with the usual care that marks the daily life of the Rationalist. Fortunately for society these fanatics prepare their white garments and get ready for the appointed day when Gabriel is to blow his trumpet, the graves give up their dead, the stars fall from heaven, and the firmament be rolled up like a scroll (the earth is pretty well rolled up now), and they shall meet their Lord in the air: but when the day comes, and the sun keeps on in its daily round, no stars fall nor trumpets blow, they quietly lay by their angel dresses, roll up their sleeves, and return to their work at forge, desk, and kitchen, while their spiritual guides go back to Daniel and St. John to count the horns of the beast, and to ask the holy spirit whether each horn is to stand for a hundred or a thousand years. In the meantime a few disappointed angels get a glimpse through the thin drapery of superstition, abandon the prophets and take up the philosophers, and become sensible men.

About this time I formed the acquaintance of a young, wild, singing, fiddling, dancing Englishman of easy virtue, and utterly incapable of constructing any system of faith for himself, or of resisting any ingenious system of faith that his neighbor, might construct for him. Accustomed from infancy to the fantastic acting of the Episcopal Church, whose ritual, ceremonies, hymns and prayers had been invented and perfected like any act of creation in the time of James I., since which this sublime comedy has been on the boards, and with but little variation. It is true, our little unpleasantness of 1776 compelled this Church in this country to evolve so far as to drop out of its prayers the Royal family of Great Britain, the two Houses of Parliament, and all the lords, dukes and duchesses, and substitute therefor his Excellency, the President of the United States, the two Houses of Congress and all the satchems of Tammany, whom the Lord has placed in authority over us, and the people now respond, "From all such, may the good Lord deliver us." But my English friend had not discovered this insignificant change in the forms of devotion. But he did discover that prayers read out of a book, by a masculine lady dressed in white, and drawled out in measured tones, did not possess that vivifying power over the worshiper, as did he who trained the artillery of his own brain, and assaulted the throne of heaven in the most fervent forms of human speech.

However, he dashed in upon me one night with, "Hurrah! G. L., here I am with my sleigh half-filled with handsome girls, and you must go with us up to the Caledonia school-house, where the Methodists, Baptists and all the saints are raising hell." All the gals are getting religion. Mary Durgin has got it, and so has Ed. Babcock—you know he would follow Mary if she went to the Devil, and so would I, too." Here he cast a rapturous glance at Ann Bulard, whose merry face vanished behind a buffalo robe to hide her blushes.

I accepted the invitation, and, amid the jingle of bells and merry voices, I sped away to see for the first time a revival of religion conducted on the American plan. We found the house crowded, but managed to procure seats. After the regular number of prayers and songs, the orator of the evening, Mr. Newton, (not Sir Isaac,) took for his text, "Now is the appointed time, now is the day of salvation." He proceeded to unfold the terrible realities of death and hell, dividing his subject, thus:

1st. Salvation implies something to be saved.

2d. It implies something to be saved from.

3d. Something to be saved by.

4th. A time to be saved.

5th, and lastly, a time when the possibility of salvation must end.

He first proceeded by the a priori method to show that there must be sinners, terrible sinners, else hell were made in vain. That some must be saved, otherwise Christ had lived and died in vain; and that if saved at all, they must be saved in time, otherwise time were made in vain; and since yesterday is gone, and to-morrow may never come, therefore now is the present time, and the only time to be saved. Then he proceeded a posteriori to show that since there could be no doubt that hell existed, and that all men were sinners, and that but one possible way of salvation was provided, that it was reasonable to suppose a good God would provide a way to let all men know it, for how could they believe unless they heard? And how can they hear without a preacher? Here he ceased to further elucidate the general principles, but began faithfully to apply these doctrines, specially to each individual present. "Sinner, dare you approach the throne of God and say, 'I am not a sinner.' Have you remembered the Sabbath day to keep it holy? Have you followed the Lord in baptism? Have you never told a lie? Have you never doubted the holy word of God? Have you never taken his sacred name in vain? Have you never denied the Christ and the holy Trinity? Have you lived in an atmosphere of prayer, trusting in God and taking no thought for to-morrow? If you have been guilty of sins, either of omission or of commission, your soul is in peril, and should death summon you to judgment while unconverted, you will surely damn your soul in hell forever and forever. You cannot plead, as could the heathen, that you have never heard of heaven and hell, Christ and his salvation, for have I not thundered it in your ears? Your fathers and your mothers have warned you; the holy spirit pleads with you; your own conscience tells you; the whole Church warns you that you are standing on the edge of the grave, and may at any moment wake up in hell, where the voice of mercy never enters."

These terrible warnings were thundered forth, peal upon peal, amid the prayers and tears and groans of an earnest multitude. At the close of the sermon the anxious seat was opened, and all who felt that they needed this salvation were invited to go forward. Mothers pleaded with their sons; grey-haired sires with their daughters; maidens with their sweethearts. Each was led to believe that he was bearing the cross in going forward before all the world to confess himself a sinner, and own his Savior before men. One after another began to go forward. At last Miss Bulard, followed by my English friend, moved toward heaven. No wonder that Adam took an apple at Eve's bidding. What paradise is not worth a woman's kiss? I was left alone. Had my Eve been there, I might have followed too. As each new penitent moved forward, a shout of glory and a hymn of praise went up to heaven. At last there was a pause; it seemed as though the last shot had been fired, and all the sinners saved; but the shepherd had resolved to gather every sheep into the fold. I had moved back into the corner. On the opposite side of the room there were still three sinners who held out. They, like myself, had crept into their corners, but the shepherd stepped into the aisle and began to clap his hands and coax, and plead and threaten till the sweat streamed down his cheeks. At last one of the three—a lady—surrendered, and the two gentlemen soon followed, amid the wildest tumult, "Glory to God! glory hallelujah!" came from all parts of the house.

He had been inspired by the wish to sweep the decks clean. He had resolved that I, like the unconquerable Cato, should grace his triumphal march to victory. "Brothers and sisters," he shouted, "will you not join me in trying to save this last poor miserable wretch from going to perdition?" I looked about me, in the hope that he might mean some one else, but no, I was the "last of the Mohicans." "O Lord, break his stubborn will! Lord, send thy arrows of conviction through his soul! Now is the appointed time; now is the day of salvation!" He jumped into the air, like a frenzied madman, and shouted as loud as he could roar, for he had a voice like the bulls of Bashan: "Come sinner; the door of mercy stands open to-night, but to-night it may close to you forever! The Devil is dragging you down to hell, and all the damned in hell are helping him! Hark! Can you not hear the roaring of the bottomless pit? Do you not feel the gnawing of the worm that never dies, already grappling at your soul? These converted sinners; the Church; Christ, the angels and the eternal God, as well as your own conscience, all say, 'Come!' Your happiness in time, and in eternity, bids you come. If you will go to hell you will have to wade through the Savior's blood and over the cross! Mountains of Bibles bar your way! Can you set at naught the prayers of the Church, the tears and blood of martyrs, the smiles and the love of woman, honor upon earth, and everlasting happiness in heaven?"

I believe it is a well recognized principle of common law that you must seek to escape from one who assaults you, until you run against a wall; then you may turn upon your assailant and defend yourself, giving blow for blow. I had crawled up to the wall. I sprang to my feet. "Who are you, sir," I said, "who stand with your hand upon the door of heaven and threaten to shut it unless I enter now? Was it by your permission I entered this world, and must I have your permission to leave it? Who told you I was a 'poor, miserable wretch,' abandoned by God and forsaken by man? Have you a contract to sell heaven to the highest bidder? Must we crawl at your feet, and lick your hands like a spaniel? Is heaven like a piece of beef, which you hold in your hand, and must we jump for it like dogs, or howl for it like beasts of prey? Would you, sir, torture your enemy with a red-hot iron for even an hour, and laugh at his shrieks, and mock at his tears? Would you, sir, dare tell me that any of these innocent children, who lie prostrate at your feet, are fiends incarnate, and would they, even, torture a savage beast because it acted out its nature? And dare you tell me that God is not as good as they? Can God ask us to forgive our enemies when he can never forgive his own thro' the endless ages? Your God is only fit for a Comanche Indian, and you are but a combination of coarseness, vulgarity, and ignorance! No gentleman would have used such language as you have to me, an entire stranger—not even under the pretext of saving his soul."

"When God is conceived of as an implacable monster, it becomes necessary for him to have wretches capable of administering his will. During the reign of William and Mary, Robert Aiken, a young man nineteen years of age, had the misfortune to arrive at the conclusion that the multiplication table was a divine revelation, and that the dogma of a Triune God was but a myth, and had been forced upon the minds of men under the influence of terror. For this offense he was tried and sentenced to be hung for blasphemy. A number of lawyers and merchants of the city of Edinburgh sent a petition to the good King William, asking that he be pardoned on account of his youth and his otherwise blameless life. The pardon came, but it came too late. The clergy hastened the execution two hours earlier than the sentence required, and a mob of white cravatted scoundrels gathered around the scaffold, backed by an ignorant and priest-ridden multitude from the slums of the city. To prevent a rescue which they feared from the friends of Free Thought and human progress, the body of Aiken was buried under the scaffold, pelted with stones and the grave filled up with rocks instead of earth. But the multiplication table survived poor Aiken, and to-day there are millions of rational men and women who accept the one and reject the other."

Fools, bigots and slaves are all that is left to the Church. Milton, who helped to destroy the despotism of the British throne, did much also towards the intellectual enfranchisement of man and the triumph of human reason. Grandest of all "Paradise Lost," is that passage where he says, "He who cannot reason is a fool; he who will not reason is a bigot, and he who dare not reason is a slave."

During my address the young men had begun to reflect, and had found their way back to the empty benches. The enchantment was broken, the reign of terror had ceased. A Mr. Wilcox, a justice of the peace and an active member of the Baptist church, stepped forward and said "he was very sorry that Mr. Newton had been carried away by his zeal so far as to forget the courtesy due a stranger. The mother of this young man is an active member of our church, and I am both surprised and sorry to hear from his own lips that he is not a Christian. I do earnestly hope that he will not judge of the religion of Christ by the frailties of his followers. I hope Mr. Newton will acknowledge his error, and that Mr. Henderson will not presume to use his reason for the purpose of destroying the Christian religion, or of calling in question the holy mysteries which God has seen fit to reveal to us through the Bible."

This was, indeed, a severe rebuke to poor Newton, whose unwilling apology was worse than the original insult. The calm, respectful and considerate language of Mr. Wilcox acted like "oil upon the troubled waters." But it also enabled the excited converts to recover their equilibrium; and I myself had been nearly as excited, though in a different way; as the Spiritualists would say, "the harmonious circle was broken." The meeting was soon dismissed with a prayer, very reasonable, both in tone and time. Next Sunday I was informed that his text was about "the Devil coming in the night, in the absence of the husbandman, and sowing tares among the wheat." Of course it is easy to conceive who the devil was, in his parable. This wretch succeeded, however, in seducing a young convert, and he afterwards abandoned his victim, and made no provision for his child. That revival resulted in four illegitimate children.

It is unquestionably true that where reason is dethroned, and the emotional nature thoroughly aroused, the passions assume the ascendancy, and sink the individual to a point as low as the devotional ecstasy had attained above the ordinary level of every day life. Therefore the sentiments and the emotions should always be subordinated to the reason.

I may here relate an occurrence which excited my attention during a brief visit at a revival meeting held at Bloomingdale, west of Chicago, in 1847. The speaker of the evening possessed a powerful voice, and toward the close of his sermon he made frequent perorations somewhat like the chorus of a song:

"Do you claim heaven on your own righteousness? Ah! but the Judge will point to the left and say, 'To hell! to hell! you too shall go to hell!' Do you propose to dance, and sing and spend your youth and money in serving the Devil, and then when you are old and can enjoy life no more, you will come to the Lord and offer him your worn-out and worthless soul? but he will point to the left and say, 'To hell! to hell! you, too, shall go to hell!'"

In every possible way he rung the change, and closed with this fearful denunciation. After leaving the church, the hostler went with me to the stable. On opening the door, a large watch-dog jumped upon him playfully, but happened to scratch a sore upon his hand. The man kicked the dog and shouted, "To hell! to hell! you, too, shall go to hell!" In attempting to enter a stall between two horses, one of them jostled him, and he repeated the terrible sentence. On leaving the barn, the wind closed the door with such violence as to split it, and also caught his blouse and held him fast. He struck the door with his foot, and for the third time hissed the terrible malediction through his set teeth. Thus I was led to reflect on the fact that the pulpit coin oaths, and the people circulate them. It would be impossible to calculate the number of times this has been reproduced in the last quarter of a century; and you see the spirit passed into the form of a kick to a howl by the dog, thence into the midnight caterwauling of the cat. The clergyman never dreamed into what a fruitful soil he had cast his seed.

Another fruitful theme of the pulpit is the French Revolution. I once heard a clergyman depict the horrors of Infidelity with a free hand, and sum up the consequences by stating that "in '93 the streets of Paris were red with blood. That king, priest and philosopher alike fell victims to the same spirit that had denied God and torn the drapery from the altar. That Voltaire, Volney, Rousseau, Robespierre, and that implacable wretch, 'Tom Paine,' were armed with pistols and Bowie-knives during the 'Reign of Terror,' shooting, stabbing and making midnight hideous with their cries for blood. If you would re-enact '93, encourage the growth of Infidelity and Atheism, then you will soon have the midnight torch and the assassin's knife at their hellish work. But let the Church be filled with worshipers and the united prayers of millions rise to the throne of God, and all will be prosperity, happiness and peace."

At the close of this wonderful mixture of arrogance and falsehood, I asked permission to present some additional facts, to show what a terrible thing this French Revolution was. My request was granted. I stated that there had been many revolutions, and they were usually marked by many painful and unpleasant events, such as assassinations, the sacking and burning of cities, but that a careful observer might see that some good always resulted therefrom. The "Round-heads" of England—all pious, praying men—had executed a king and overturned a government, in doing which, over one hundred thousand lives had been sacrificed, and all because a brewer and a landowner would not pay a tax levied by a king, but not sanctioned by Parliament. In '93, not over four thousand perished by the guillotine, and the most extravagant estimate places the limit at fifteen thousand, while in 1572, on the 25th of August, forty thousand perished in one night, in the name of God, and by the sanction of his priests and their ally, the king. Pope Gregory, the Vicar of Christ, ordered Te Deums to be chanted in St. Peters in honor of the event.

The Protestant Church has shown, in the spirit of its laws, an equal willingness to crush out all the enemies of God. In Ireland a Catholic priest must not ride on a horse within seven miles of a royal burgh. To perform any religious ceremony, or marry a Protestant and Catholic together involved the penalty of death. For one hundred and fifty years the footprints of the Catholics of Ireland were marked with blood. During the reigns of Charles V. and Philip II., and under that remorseless military leader, Alva, there perished in the Netherlands and Spain by poison, the fagot and the sword, over one million of human beings; and Christianity can safely be credited for the murder of sixty millions of the race during the sixteen hundred years of its supremacy in Europe. And allow me to say that Voltaire and Rousseau were both dead before the Revolution began. Volney was part of the time in Corsica, in prison, and Thomas Paine, the "author hero," voted against the execution of Louis and was sent to prison, and would have been sent to the scaffold but for a fortunate circumstance that saved him. Robespierre, naturally opposed to cruelty, could not oppose the ferocity, which was the result of ages of repression and ignorance, so that the crimes of the French Revolution may be justly laid at the door of the Christian Church, which has been the educator of the people."

The gentleman expressed his surprise at what I had stated, and confessed that he had never read a history of the Revolution, but had always supposed that all the crimes of that period were chargeable to those men and their opinions.

Universalism had contributed largely to the enlightenment of the people, by giving more generous conceptions of a God, but intellectually it stands no higher, and in some respects it is less logical than the old orthodox systems. Spiritualism, perhaps, of all the modern phases of sectarianism, is at once the most destructive and reactionary. It has denied all the miracles of the old faiths, and professes to work out in harmony with natural law the most marvelous things. I have heard them ridicule the conception of a special Providence, and proceed to tell of a spirit arresting them on the street until a falling tile had reached the pavement. They conceive the spirit to be at once material and immaterial. I was told but recently, that a spirit could materialize cotton and woolen fabrics, which could be both touched and seen, and then dissolve into impalpable and invisible matter, while flowers could be materialized and distributed as other flowers, remaining, however, until the decay of nature dissolves them as it dissolves all bodies. In the old ghost ideas of Christianity, the phantom was an object of terror, and the haunted-house was shunned; but the modern ghost of the Spiritualist is treated as an ordinary friend. They talk with him, shake hands with him, compel him to lift pianos and tables, and also do washing—in this case they use the hands of the medium, which is a very sensible application of this new force.

The Masonic society is another agency that has contributed largely to dissipate superstition and also prepare the way for a rational direction to the devotional and social instincts. This society furnishes a ceremonial and orderly arrangement of its members, each class in subordination to the one above it, as in society; and it also inculcates, as a duty, fraternal aid and sympathy in the various emergencies of life. I have seen the members of this society manifest a care and attention for the sick and dying of its order such as can only be had in the bosom of a well-regulated family, bound together by the tenderest sympathy, and after death the brother is buried with pomp, and a beautiful ritual, half Druid, half Christian, is read at the grave. The brother, if deserving, is apotheosized, and his name preserved in the records of the order. Where this order has come under my observation in the West, I have noticed that its members generally prefer the fraternity of the lodge to the fellowship of the Church, and many of them have long since severed all connection with the latter, and I have noticed a steadily growing opposition on the part of the Church to this order, as the natural enemy of superstition, whether of the Roman Catholic or Protestant type.

Another agency that has contributed largely to hasten the decay of ecclesiasticism is the persistent manner in which it allied itself with the last relics of feudalism on this continent. I remember a singular scene at a meeting of the Methodist church, where the true infidelity appeared in the church itself by its opposition to the moral sentiments of the age. In 1861 a large meeting of the Methodist church gathered in conference, in Aamakee Co., Iowa. On that occasion the clergy were a unit in opposing the aggressive spirit of the people toward the Christian slaveholders of the South. Every passage of the Bible was marshalled and made to do service for established order; it argued that God had seen fit in his inscrutable providence to transplant the African to this continent, where millions of them had been converted, civilized, and saved. That if God ruled the Universe he must govern it for the best, and he had ordered "servants to obey their masters," and the people to submit themselves to the powers that be, for those powers being from God, they who opposed them opposed God. A Mr. John Minant, a good Methodist, and a just man, and my father, though of another church, both lifted their voices against this mode of reasoning, which, as they pointed out, practically sanctioned every villainy that could get unto itself authority sufficient to become the law making and executing power; that rebellion against Great Britain was a crime, and every subsequent act of this government a violation of the will of God. After this meeting Minant shook hands with me more cordially, and, to a limited extent, ever after ignored the authority of the church; and I think that the political conflict hastened forward the disintegration that is now, everywhere on this continent, grinding the Church to powder.

Another powerful agency in this direction is the rapid spread of scientific literature, for which there is a steadily increasing demand in the Western States. At Osage, Mitchell Co., Iowa, three years ago I visited the city library, and enquired of the librarian what class of books was most sought for and read. He answered, the works of Tyndall, Darwin, Max Muller, Spencer, and Huxley. While we were talking a lady of culture and refinement—a Mrs. Gibson—stepped forward and enquired for the second volume of the "Descent of Man." Mr. Rozine replied that he was "sorry it was not in, and that she must register for such a book four weeks in advance."

"Then take my application now."

"But," said Mr. R., "I have 'Darwinism Refuted,' won't you read that?"

"That must be written by some D.D., and I stopped reading their 'stuff' five years ago."

A lady just then stepped in with a book in her hand, and, saluting Mrs. Gibson, enquired what book she had read last. The reply was, the first volume of the "Descent of Man."

"Why, Mrs. Gibson, I supposed that was not fit for a lady to read!"

"As to that," replied Mrs. G., "every lady must judge for herself. Do you think the Bible a fit book for a lady to read?"

"Certainly; it is, you know, the word of God."

"Then if you will agree to read before a refined audience ten verses from the Bible, which I will select for you, I will agree to read the whole of the two volumes of that great book without a blush, and without the least apprehension of bringing a blush to the cheek of the purest maiden. Why, my dear, neither God nor man do the best work first. You know Burns says,

'God tried his 'prentice hand on man,

And then he made the lasses, oh!'

And so with books. There is more divine revelation in one page of Darwin's great work than there is in all the books of Moses and the Prophets, and for good measure, I will throw in the twelve Apostles also."

The lady declined the challenge. I noticed that other ladies treated Mrs. Gibson's opinions with great deference, as one whose judgment was final.

Another indication of the rise and progress of free thought in the West, is the sweeping off the statute books all the "blue laws," and where they are not swept entirely away they are ignored. In this city the immaculate Victoria Woodhull compelled a judge to seal the lips of a witness, on the ground of alleged atheism. Not many months ago a similar attempt was made in one of the District Courts of Minnesota, but the judge declined to apply the gag. The attorney, however, opened an inquisition into the speculative opinions of the witness.

"Do you believe in a God?"

"I do."

"What is your God?"

"The Universe."

"But that is made up of many material things, some wise men and many fools!"

"Yes, undoubtedly; but, fortunately, you are only a very small part of the Universe."

"You are insolent, sir; answer yes or no: do you believe in a personal God, separate and apart from the Universe?"

"I do not. I believe in all I know to exist, and in all that I can conceive to exist, which is my God, and all the rest is yours."

Here the Court interposed, ordering the attorney to go on with the case in hand. "The value of his evidence will depend upon its consistency, and his character for veracity. This Court could never decide whether his God—the Universe—was large enough or small enough to comply with the requirements of the statute."

The attorney was compelled to take an Atheist's testimony, and a Christian jury accepted it; for one of them once lost $500, and a brother of the witness found it and returned it, without any fee for being honest, and the juror knew that this brother was also an Atheist. He declared before his fellow jurors that any man who returned $500 to the rightful owner in these hard times, believed in a pretty good kind of a God, no matter whether he was a universal something or an everlasting nothing.

In conclusion I would say from my observations for a quarter of a century, that the Western States are intellectually prepared for the entire separation from the Church, and are in fact, virtually separated from it, so far as a hearty support of its dogmas are concerned, even by the insignificant number who now occupy the pews. The fertility of the soil, the feeble barrier opposed by Nature to the all-conquering march of civilization, tend to increase the conviction that human effort, not human prayer, can alone either remove mountains or tunnel them, bridge rivers or create them where they are needed; hence there is a steady increase of the belief in the freedom of the will and of the right to a free exercise of the intellect on all subjects whatever.

2d. The rapid and ever-increasing number of new sects, each sect setting up claims to perfection and practically laying claim to infallibility. And although Evangelical Alliances have made repeated attempts to re-unite their so-called forces, they have found it utterly impossible; because they have no intellectual basis upon which to lay the foundation of a permanent union.

3d. The inability of the old theological system to meet the critical spirit of the age, has compelled them to stoop to a species of intellectual deceit to escape from the two horns of a dilemma on which science is alternately tossing them. One being that their sacred books are false in their scientific teaching, or that they have misunderstood them. If they admit the first, then the foundation is bad. If the latter, the interpretation is worthless and their guidance no longer safe.

4th. The intellectual hypocrisy that seeks to escape through new interpretations has been followed by a moral corruption in the entire priesthood, which for a time seems to sap the very foundation upon which all social morality rests, in the destruction of the integrity of the family itself, and the virtues which it alone can create and diffuse throughout the entire social body. The sudden outbreak of Mormonism, with the revival of polygamy, is the least dangerous aspect of the general corruption. Christianity commenced with celibacy among the clergy; it seems destined to end with a disgraceful retrogression to Polyandry. The priest, as in the case of Glendenning, withers up a young maiden's life without compunction; and as in the case of Beecher, it lays its sacrilegious hand upon the mother and blasts a home forever. The polygamy of Utah is respectable compared with the polyandry of the Churches. The Mormon provides houses, food and clothing for his wives and children; but the ministers, like the sweet-voiced cuckoo, lay their eggs in other birds' nests, and thus escape the duties of providing for their own offspring.

There is but one more step to take, when what still remains of the Church will be placed in the museum, to be arranged, and classified by the antiquarian with the mummies of Egypt, and as a fossil whose only merit is its antiquity, and that is the separation of Church and State. For so long as great religious corporations escape taxation, they are virtually State institutions. As soon as the burden of their support is borne only by those who use these expensive toys called churches, they will throw down the load with disgust and open these edifices either as halls of science or human homes. Once the cry was, no taxation without representation; the coming cry will be, no State protection for property that does not support the State; no exemption from taxation of any property when the title is not vested in the whole people.

When that is consummated, a State-paid Church will lie in the same grave with its twin-sister, slavery, whose continued existence depended wholly upon its protection from the State.

The West, the glorious free West, will lead the way to this grand consummation. Then the new Church will depend wholly upon its utility to the people. It will not be reactionary like the Church of Rome, nor stationary like the Protestant Church. It will combine order with progress and march forward under the banner of science to achieve new victories and attain a higher intelligence and a purer happiness for the whole human race.

The usual discussion followed the lecture, which was participated in by several members of the Club, a part of which was complimentary of the lecturer, and a part in the line of friendly criticism, but for want of room we cannot lay it before our readers. It may be safely said, however, that none of the positions taken by Mr. Henderson were effectually refuted.

J. C. STEINMETZ, Monroe, N. Y., writes: The publication of such a paper as yours is a necessity to the Liberal element of this country, and I trust that your efforts against priestcraft and Churchianity may be sustained.

JACOB REEDY, Toledo, Iowa, writes: Your little paper is doing its work splendidly in this section of country. I believe it is more effective in opening the eyes of the blind than Christ's clay and spittle salve, or the washing in the pool of Salome.

F. A. GRAACK, Davenport, Iowa, writes: I like your paper very much. Its contents are such as to set people to thinking, without hurting the feelings of any. I am pleased to see that you confine yourself to fighting superstition, and the evils growing out of faith and belief.

JAMES BROWN, Galt, Ont., Can., writes: I must also congratulate you on the ability of your lecture on the Gods, which is not surpassed by anything I have ever read upon the subject. THE TRUTH SEEKER has been generally conducted in an able manner, and it merits the approval of all its readers.

JOHN CUNLIFFE, Du Quoin, Ill., writes: I am not given to flattery, but I must say that I like your paper as well as any Liberal paper I read, and these include the Investigator, London National Reformer, and the Reasoner. I hope to see THE TRUTH SEEKER flourish as a weekly, as it deserves to. Put me down as a subscriber for next year.

S. M. BALDWIN, Washington, D. C., writes: I feel like giving you the cordial right hand of congratulation in the name of the Liberal world. Although you commenced in weakness only a little while ago, you now have the strongest and best paper on the planet for rational men and women. I hear your paper highly praised on all sides by people who have back bone enough to think independently.

REV. J. M. GETCHELL, Black River Falls, Wis., writes: Notwithstanding I have the Rev. to my name, I enjoy reading your paper. I do not endorse all of its thoughts; yet I believe that comparative ideas, as well as comparative theology, is beneficial. I trust I do not make the denomination or church to which I belong a charnel house for dead theories of truth. I think the principles as set forth by the great teacher are vital, yet I would not put the new wine of his blessed spirit as it comes to my soul into old bottles.

E. L. WINHAM, Atlanta, Ga., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and think it gets better all the time. Am glad you are going to make it a weekly next year. I pay for it more cheerfully than any other literature I get, because it suits me better. I infer you must have met with considerable encouragement, or you would not venture upon a weekly. Will try and get as many new subscribers for you as I possibly can. Whether successful or not, I shall not be deprived of the satisfaction of wishing for you thousands of new, paying subscribers for the next and all succeeding volumes.

L. H. BRONHAM, New York, writes: From the time I was eighteen years of age, I have fought priestcraft and kingcraft. I am now past seventy. The Bible has been the main weapon I have used. The priests can't stand a well-directed cross fire from their pretended word of God. The obscenity contained in the book is too much for them. The story of Lot's daughters, of David and Uriah's wife, Absalom's show on the house top, (2 Sam. xvi. 20-23) together with the Songs of Solomon, make them hang their heads now-a-days. But one thing disturbs me as I advance in years: that is, I fear some lev. leecher will be permitted to pray over my corpse. I do not wish them allowed at my funeral. I only request that some of my friends among the Liberals and Land Reformers would attend and improve the occasion by conversation on land reform, public education and the most effective means of putting down priestcraft and superstition of every kind.

J. B. EATON, Utica, N. Y., writes: I read the different Liberal papers of this country, and there is none I prize as highly as THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is just the paper for the age and people. I think, from present indications, that we have much to fear from the Romish Church. This Church I look upon as a dangerous political power in this country. It is not the fear of God nor the Devil that restrains the members, but the fear of the priests. If it was not for this fear, Catholics, almost to a man, would become Liberals. But Liberals stand in no fear of God, man or the Devil. It stands us in hand to live pure and honest lives, and I am proud to say, that as far as I am acquainted with them, their lives are the best of any class of people in the world.

D. R. SPARKS, Alton, Ill., writes: When I first received your little sheet from Paris, Ill., I had no confidence in its success, and when you concluded to make it a semi-monthly, I doubted. But I doubt no longer, and shall welcome the weekly and wish it success. THE TRUTH SEEKER is well worthy its name. Its bold, unvarnished attacks on false theologies and superstitions, is what we want. Give us plain talk, plain truths, instead of fine spoken, unmeaning stuff, which so many of our Free-thinkers indulge in. The great power of the immortal Thomas Paine, was in his plain, positive manner of writing; and though long since dead, his written words are to-day shaking the foundations of the Christian Church.

A. D. CORNWELL, Salem, Wis., writes: I am glad you are about to send out a weekly, and at the low price of two dollars per year. THE TRUTH SEEKER has the right ring to my mind—it is bold, frank, and tells the truth. I wish every soul in the land would read it, for its teachings would make them free from the dead theologies of the past. I wish I was rich in the world's goods; if I were, such publications as THE TRUTH SEEKER would be better sustained.

The poor priest-ridden people fear they will lose their souls if they fail to support the popular religion. All races of men have made their own religion, and all devotional religion is idolatry. We should be free to criticize all the theologies of the past and present, and reject all that does not square with good sense and practical life.

L. S. HART, Michigan City, Ind., writes: About a year ago a combination of clerical and orthodox scoundrels joined against me on account of my Liberal opinions, and beat me out of a situation where I was getting $1000 per annum, since which time I have had all I could do to support my family, which accounts for my not remitting my subscription more promptly. Spiritualists are looked upon by religious fanatics as being more dangerous than Materialists. To only say that I admire THE TRUTH SEEKER would be expressing myself in a weak way. The harder the blows you strike against such a hell-fired crew of damnable idiots and swindling scoundrels, the better you will please me. I cannot believe, however, that a man of your intelligence can fail to see that the reasoning force which goes by the name of D. M. Bennett will cease to exist. When Nature causes the stoppage or death of the machine which the Bennett reasoning force propels, you know you will continue to exist. If you should not, then there would be a fault in that universal system of law that produced you.

The True Remedy.

WOODSTOCK, ILLS., June 21, 1875.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS.—Dear Sir:

I have received the six boxes of Powder, and have taken them according to directions, and I am ever so much better. I can sleep well; my appetite is good; I am stronger. Before taking the Powder I could not sleep; and when I laid down I was in such distress that I could not lie in one position but a few minutes at a time. I was bloated considerably on my left side, so I could neither sit or lie with any comfort. I had spells when it seemed my heart did not beat, and that I could not breathe, but now I am entirely cured. With grateful thanks I remain

A GERMAN paper expresses uneasiness at the decreasing population of Prussia proper. Between 1861 and 1864 there was an increase of 8,409, but between 1864 and 1867 there was a decrease of 12,922, and between 1867 and 1871 one of 56,440. Allowing for the loss of life in the last two wars, and for the Prussian soldiers quartered in France at the time of the census, the loss of population in ten years amounts to 52,200.

JUDGE BURNHAM, of the "Boston Tachygraphic Society," proposed to drop the letter "a" from "head," and "ugh" from "though," as "u" was dropped from "labor," "honor," and "valor," and "k" from "almanac," "music," and "logic." Millions of minutes and money are lost in writing useless letters. We should adhere to the phonetic rule of letting each letter have only one sound, and each sound one letter. The pen of a rapid writer travels a mile in five and a half hours, and makes more than forty millions of strokes in a year.

SECOND EDITION.

Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism.

BY N. B. WOLFE, M.D.

The constant and regular demand for this book exhausted the first edition some months ago, although a very large edition was worked off. For the second edition the plates have been carefully revised under the immediate supervision of the author. The publishers have had the paper made expressly for the second edition and the united efforts of the Author and Publishers have placed on sale a very fine and attractive appearing book. Although no expense has been deemed too great that would add to the perfection of the book; the price has been reduced one-fifth.

"STARTLING FACTS IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM" embodies some of the most remarkable and wonderful facts, ever published, and of the deepest interest to all. The truth of the history herein set forth in such graphic and absorbing style, is clearly established by the most indubitable evidence. Among the witnesses are some of the prominent members of the press, and others equally well known.

The book is a large 12mo., 543 pp. Bound in extra heavy cloth, illuminated with four elegant steel portraits and numerous fine wood engravings.

PRICE, $2. Postage, 25 cents.

THE BHAGAVAD-GITA;

Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna.

A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM,

TRANSLATED, WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days: the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than divine commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is "in the plan of salvation" instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's.

At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flend came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them he work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

"More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west."—Inter-Ocean.

This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science."—Our Fireside Friend.

"This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life."—Overland Monthly.

"This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profounder sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people. The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chronology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book. . . . Grandly useful, especially as it is thoroughly indexed."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations."—Truth Seeker.

"This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people."—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

The book is a 12mo. of 278 pages, and the mechanical part is finished in a superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. THEHEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "EXETER HALL."

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH. "Rich in romantic and pathetic incident." It exhibits, with a terrible array of facts, the atrocities committed by the Christian Church at various times. It shows that "the purest morals existed without the Bible," and that many of the Heathen Philosophers were as great lovers of virtue as the characters named in the Bible. Shocking instances are given of the depravity of many Christian ministers, and of the prevailing inhumanity among Christian people. "The folly of Foreign Missions, while the heathen at home are neglected, is powerfully illustrated." "On the whole it is the work of a master hand." "A work of unaffected beauty," and its most valuable feature is, all positions are proved and authorities given.

"Beautiful, tender, delicate, and pathetic in its appeals." "A truthful portrait of the mischievous tendencies of religion." It is a "denial of the authority and inspiration of the Bible." It portrays the "development of the practical effects of religious fanaticism as seen in the family and in society." "Altogether it is the most scorching book ever published in America since the 'Age of Reason.'"

Paper, 60c.; Cloth, 80c.

PRESS COMMENTS.

"One of the sharpest, most satirical poems ever brought before the American public. Logical, witty, and mirth-provoking. The subject of the rhymes is the great Woodhull-Tilton-Beecher scandal.

A rough, wide-awake Yankee, by the name of "Jonathan," a kind of a John Hay of a fellow, hauls all the characters over the coals in a sensible manner. There is more stern logic in his off-hand hits, than is often found in such rough-clad phraseology. The one who reads this pamphlet will never regret the investment."
—Crucible, Boston.

"Davis' new poem is in his best vein.
Racy, trenchant, suggestive, it will help people to a knowledge of the truth of the Beecher scandal, and more sensible views regarding love and marriage."—The Word,

Odds and Ends.

"You would be very pretty, indeed," said a gentleman, patronizingly, to a young lady, "if your eyes were only a little larger." My eyes may be very small, sir, but such people as you don't fill them."

"You've pinned it back he cried, with grief.
Much further than you'd order:
Your front stands out in bold relief—
My darter! oh, my darter!"

A CONNECTICUT editor, returning from a clam bake, discoursed as follows:

O, clam, that sitteth silent and serene
Beside the margin of the mighty sea,
Whose grief or madness has no power to wean

Thy spirit from its old tranquillity;
Or who, reposing underneath the sand,
Dost greet the dreamer, gazing far away,
Who over thee unconsciously doth stand,
By squatting in a most peculiar way;
I love thee, clam, thou dweller by the sea!
Thy rich secretions savor of its wealth;
For succulent thou art to a degree,
And no ways prejudicial to the health,
To daily feed upon thee would be my wish.
Go to! Thou art the monarch of all fish.

MAX ADELER tells a new story, the gist of which is as follows: Bill Slocum was nominated for Mayor of Pencader, and one day, in a street conversation, he remarked, "I've got to win." He pronounced it, "I've got t'win," and old Mrs. Martin, overhearing it imperfectly, went around and reported that Mrs. Slocum had got twins. The boys at once decided to serenade Bill, and that night they marched out to his house, with a band playing "Hail to the Chief," several ward clubs, some fire companies, a group of white-dressed girls in a wagon, a lot of banners, and plenty of enthusiasm. Bill made a speech about the canvass, and there were shouts of "Where's the twins!" "Hold 'em up to the window!" and the like, Bill said there was a mistake, but the band sarcastically played, "Listen to the Mocking Bird!" and the boys shouted louder for the twins. When the truth prevailed the assembly dispersed in disgust, and Bill was overwhelmingly defeated at the polls.

A DUTCH VICTORY.—A crowd of young chaps about town were in one of the popular beer saloons yesterday, where they met a jolly old German, who often gets thoroughly soaked in beer and maudlin funny.

"Hello, Kaiserlicher, have you heard the news?" said one.

"Nein: vas ish das?"

"The Water Works are busted!"

"Vel, dot's bad mit dem tembrance beeples, don't id, poys?" [Laughter all round.]

"Yes, and the rolling mill's gone up!" said another of the boys.

"Vel, ehust don't got skeered about that; it's so heffy dot it goom don again, eh? [A grand peal of laughter.]

"And—and—the ice machine has exploded!" cried a third.

"Ish dot bin possible? Den dot's bad, midout some misdake, and id don't rain midout it pours—de vasser out—de rolling mill out—no more ize—unt all you young shackasses broke out of de shtable lot! Dot makes megry!"

And nobody thought it necessary to laugh.—Atlanta Constitution.

RESIGNED TO HIS LOSS.—The funeral party had retired from the burying ground, but he lingered about like a loving widower, to see the last sod put on. With his black clothes, his black silk gloves, his black-bordered handkerchief hanging carelessly in his left hand, his sombre visage, and half a yard of black bombazine wreathed around his black hat, he seemed the very picture of melancholy. Presently he awoke from the reverie into which he had fallen, and said to the grave-digger:

"I hope you think she is comfort'ble down thur. I've put in all the style I knew how: prime rosewood coffin and trimmin's, an' seventeen carriages. She oughten to be oneasy."

"Oh, she'll never bother you again," cheerfully replied the brisk little spades-man, stopping back to see if he had built up the mound symmetrically.

"Well, now, I am glad to hear you say that," added the bereaved man, "'cause you see, I expect to have another one afore Christmas, and I don't want the spirit of this here onfort'nate to come roamin' round the house."

Then he turned and walked out of the cemetery with the expression of a man returning from the performance of a benevolent deed.—Detroit Free Press.

A MINISTER WHO COULDN'T STAND THE TEST.—A well-known clergyman was passing Lake Erie many years ago upon one of the lake steamers, and, seeing a small lad at the wheel steering the boat, accosted him as follows:

"My son, you appear to be a small boy to steer so large a boat."

"Yes sir; but you can see that I can do it, though."

"Do you think you understand your business, my son?"

"Yes, sir, I think I do."

"Can you box the compass?"

"Yes, sir."

"Let me hear you box it."

Boy boxes the compass.

"Well, really, you can do it! Let me hear you box it backward."

Boy boxes it backward.

"I declare, my son, you do seem to understand your business."

The boy now took his turn question-asking.

"Pray, sir, what may be your business?"

"I am a minister of the Gospel."

"Do you understand your business?"

"I think I do, my son."

"Can you say the Lords' Prayer?"

"Yes."

"Say it."

Clergyman repeats the Lords' Prayer.

"Well, really, you do know it! Now say it backward."

Clergyman says he cannot do it.

"You cannot do it, eh? Now, you see I understand my business a great deal better than you do yours."

Clergyman acknowledged himself beaten, and retired.—Providence Journal.

A YEAR AGO AND NOW.—They lingered at the gate until he could finish that last remark, and she toyed with her fan, while her eyes were looking down from beneath a jaunty hat that only partially shaded her face from the light of the silvery moon.

He stood gracefully on the outside, with one hand resting on the gate post, and the other tracing unintelligible hieroglyphics on the panels. They were looking very sentimental, and neither spoke for some minutes, until she broke silence in a sweet, musical voice:

"And you will always think as you do now, George?"

"Ever, dearest; your image is impressed upon my heart so indelibly that nothing can ever efface it. Tell me, Julia, loveliest of your sex, that I have a right to wear it there."

"Oh, you men are so deceitful," she answered, coquettishly.

"True, Julia, men are deceitful," he said, drawing a little nearer to her and insinuating himself inside the gate, "but, who, darling, could deceive you?"

"And if I were to die, George, wouldn't you find some one else you could love as well?"

"Never, never. No woman could ever fill your place in my heart."

"Oh, quit now! That ain't right," she murmured, as she made a feint to remove his arm from around her waist.

"Let me hold you to my heart," he whispered passionately, "until you have consented to be mine," and he drew her nearer to him and held her tightly until he obtained the coveted boon.

It seemed but yesterday since our weary footsteps interrupted that touching little scene, but when we passed near the same locality early yesterday morning, ere the moon and stars had paled, and heard a gentle voice exclaim:

"No sir; you've stayed out this long, and you may just as well make a night of it. I'll teach you to stay at the lodge until 3 o'clock in the morning, and then come fooling around my door to worry me and wake the baby. Now, take that, and sleep on it."—Vicksburg Herald.

CAME TO GRIEF.—The Rev. Thomas J. Weeks, regularly ordained pastor of the Baptist Church, was a few days ago sentenced in this city to two years imprisonment in State prison, for stealing, or for harboring stolen goods.

THE Roman Catholic Church in Nicaragua observes eighty-two feast days. Estimating the laboring population at 15,000, and wages at thirty cents per day, the country sustains an annual loss of at least $3,000,000, besides a vast diminution in its agricultural products.

A BUFFALO physician asserts that iron at a white heat produces merely a tickling sensation on the flesh, and therefore Clara Morris could not have suffered the exquisite torture reported. We prefer to be tickled with a feather than with an iron at white or red heat.

ABOUT THE AVERAGE.—The last week the police arrested 2,108 persons in this city; there were 586 deaths and 464 births and 36 marriages. The deaths nearly always exceed the births, showing that if we did not get recruits from the outside world, we would in time all die off.

MR. G. W. SMITH has been directed by the trustees of the British Museum to resume his excavations at Nineveh, and he expects to start soon for the East. His new book on the "Chaldean Account of the Genesis," which contains his recent discoveries is now in the press, and will shortly be published.

JAMES LICK has just proposed to build his $800,000 astronomical observatory on the summit of Mount Hamilton, if the Supervisors of Santa Clara county will construct a railroad thither from San Jose. Mount Hamilton is sixty-five miles from San Francisco, and its summit is 4,440 feet high. It is thought by many that Mount Diablo would be a better site.

THEODORE TILTON is succeeding remarkably well in his starring lecturing tour. He draws immense houses everywhere. In this city and in Brooklyn his lectures were perfect ovations. The houses were densely crammed, and he was heartily and repeatedly applauded. His lectures were pronounced the finest specimens of oratory delivered here for many years.

BETTER STEP DOWN AND OUT.—Mr. Beecher's "future" is not likely to be free from the infamous stain upon his character, at least so long as he does everything in his power to hinder and prevent a complete investigation of the charges against him. If he will only get out of the pulpit, which he disgraces by his presence, the Christian world will care little where he goes.—Troy Press.

IF THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY is true, the Catholics are quite right in holding the Virgin Mary in the high esteem they do. A woman capable of acting as wife to one God, (with all the name implies) and being mother of another God, is fitted to be called the "Queen of Heaven," and is doubtless as deserving of great reverence, honor and worship, as were Venus and Juno of the ancient Greeks.

IT is a popular belief that lightning will not strike a beech tree. In a recent thunder shower at Goshen, Mass., a beech and maple standing near together, with branches interlocking each other, received the electric bolt, which shattered the maple and passed into the earth, through a prostrate hemlock tree lying near, which was stripped of its bark nearly the whole length. No trace of the lightning was left upon the beech.

"POT CALLING KETTLE BLACK."—Rev. Dr. Crosby of our city, recently referring to medical fees, said: "If some of our doctors ever become knights, they will be knights of the Golden Fleece." Now if the doctors of medicine are any more fond of the golden fleece than the doctors of divinity, the poor sheep are to be pitied indeed. As it is, the simple sheep are nearly doctored to nakedness and have to stand shivering in the cold.

BEWARE OF POISON.—Henry Ward Beecher announces that he proposes to take "a far more active part" in the management of the Christian Union than heretofore, and to "make the paper his own in a more important sense than it ever has been." "I shall consider it," he adds "as a parish, parallel with Plymouth Church."

This announcement should be sufficient to keep the Christian Union out of all families where honor, virtue, truth, and piety are respected.—N. Y. Sun.

GIVING EXPLICIT INSTRUCTIONS.—A pious deacon praying earnestly for rain in a long dry time, expressed himself as follows: "O Lord thou knowest the earth is dry and parched, and that all vegetation is dying for want of rain. If in thy wisdom thou seest fit to send us refreshing rains, do not withhold the same. But, O Lord, we would ask thee, not to send it in such profuse and violent a manner as to suddenly raise our streams and wash away our haycocks, fences and bridges, but let it come drizzle drozzle, drizzle drozzle, for about a week, for the Redeemer's sake. Amen!"

A BAD RECORD TO LEAVE BEHIND.—The Hon. Geo. W. Bardwell, member of the Legislature and deacon of the Methodist Church, of which he was a shining member, in a thriving Massachusetts town, was recently called to "pass in his checks" and close his earthly career. After his death it was found he had been a very bad man. A large amount of forged paper was traced to him, and it was proven that he had also robbed his brother deacon, Zedediah Graves, of nearly $2000, and had caused a suspicion of the theft to be directed to innocent parties. It is to be hoped such deacons will not become abundant.

REV. NATHAN DAVIDSON of Rayton, Ga., while recently preaching upon the miracles, and after describing the restoration of the blind man's sight, (John ix. 6) made this expression; "Now this was very foolish of the Savior." The story goes that he had hardly uttered the words, when his tongue was paralyzed and for several hours did not recover the power of speech. As soon as he was able to speak, however, he said what he intended to say, was: "Now this was very foolish of the Savior from a worldly point of view." It was held that he was stricken with dumbness on account of the impious expression he made; but a nice question is here involved between Providence and fore-knowledge. The belief that it was a providential rebuke is placed in the awkward dilemma, that Providence had smitten an innocent man from a lack of knowledge of what he was going to say. If Davidson tells the truth, Providence showed undue haste to smite him before he knew what the man intended to say, while if Davidson lies, Providence showed himself guilty of inconsistency in punishing the man for blasphemy, and letting him pass free for lying. Which is it? Nice point, this.

NOT APPRECIATED.—The Rev. J. D. Fulton of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, is falling into disfavor with his flock, and they have demanded his resignation on the ground of "brusqueness," dogmatic manners, arrogance, self will, softening of the brain, uncomplaisance, falsehood, &c., &c. Although his congregation may see many imperfections in him, they do not charge him with not having the requisite love of Jesus. The great love he bears his master may outweigh his many faults. Later. After a regular prayer-meeting a few evenings since, the congregation of Bro. Fulton's Church held an animated discussion and an election to decide whether their pastor should step down and out. The deacons and near one hundred of the faithful were opposed to the pastor, while a somewhat larger number remained faithful to him. Hot words and harsh epithets passed currently from side to side. The parson acted as moderator, and when one of the deacons upraised him for words he had used in prayer, detrimental to the deacons, the parson meekly told the critical deacon that it was none of his business what words he (the parson) used in prayer. The Christian love manifested on the occasion was not of the Jesus kind; and the trouble is not yet ended.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

The Priesthood Further Considered.—Conclusion.

The art of proselyting they understood to perfection. This is an important part of their business. However ignorant they may be on all other subjects, this they perfectly well understand. They are in possession of all the accumulated experience of a long line of predecessors extending through all of the past ages. They know human nature well and how to take advantage of its weaknesses. They make their appeals to the superstitious, selfish hopes and fears of ignorant men, and having what Archimedes only wanted, another world on which to plant their machinery. It is no wonder that in almost all past times they have moved this at their pleasure. They tax all their ingenuity and eloquence in describing the beauties of a heaven about which they know nothing, and a hell of which they are equally ignorant, and the one they promise as a reward to all who embrace their doctrines, the other they threaten as a punishment to be inflicted on all who do not. In this way they may succeed, perhaps, in luring some and entrancing others, but no man was ever made really any better by being actuated by such selfish considerations. They condemn human selfishness and yet cultivate and strengthen it by making constant appeals to it. They are the greatest beggars in the world. Their horseleech cry of give, give, can be heard on the mountains and in the valleys, in the public streets and in the churches. At every public meeting ostensibly for the worship of God, the contribution box is passed around and the people are entreated in God's name to give. The people are assured that if they will give, God will restore to them four-fold, but not one of them will stand sponsor for the fulfillment of the promise or guarantee the refunding of the gift in case it is not. In a thousand variety of ways vast sums of money are raised by these men which goes to help the warring sects to vie with each other in building costly churches and to support a class of useless drones in the human hive.

The same envyings and jealousies that exist among the members of other learned professions exist among them. They will unscrupulously resort to measures to supplant a brother in an advantageous situation, or in the esteem and affections of the people which lawyers and physicians scorn to adopt, and have too great a sense of horror and manhood to think of adopting. If one of their number happens to become convinced of the erroneousness of his creed and has independence and moral courage enough to avow his honest opinions, the rest will pounce on him like a hawk upon a chicken. They will pursue him with misrepresentations and slander, hurl at him the epithets of "infidelity," "emissary of Satan," "enemy of religion," call him a Judas, a renegade, an apostate, ostracise him from society if they can, and all to counteract his influence in opposition to their sectarian views. On the other hand if one of their profession is accused of any crime, the rest of the fraternity will gather around him, form a solid phalanx, and shield him from exposure if they can. The peculiar position occupied by these men brings them into close relation to the female sex. They knowing that women are more susceptible of religious as well as superstitious influence than men, regard them as their right-hand weapon of offensive and defensive war. They rely mainly on them to further their designs. Women educated to believe that they must depend on men for support and protection, will inevitably be inclined to look up to the clergy for religious guidance and instruction. This brings them into frequent and familiar intimacy with that class of men. What has been the result? Not only are our sectarian churches made up principally of women and children, but the history of the priesthood in all ages and countries proves that by no other class of professional men have so many crimes against female virtue been committed as by them.

The clergy profess to look upon what they call Infidelity and Materialism with the utmost horror and detestation. They represent that the Materialistic doctrines are destructive of all joy and peace on earth, and deprive us of all our bright hopes and anticipations in regard to the future. Apparently they are entirely unconscious of the fact that they themselves are constantly promulgating a doctrine as much more horrible than anything in Materialism as it is in the power of the human imagination to conceive. At the very worst, even, ultra-Materialism would do nothing worse than consign us to the quiet sleep of non-existence or annihilation, whereas the doctrine of the clergy would involve a majority of our race in miseries untold, never-ending and indescribable. All, therefore, who hope for a future blissful existence, must desire it with the full knowledge that if they have it, they enjoy it at the expense of the endless and inconceivable sufferings of millions of their fellow men. Can a more monstrous exhibition of supreme selfishness be conceived?

These men claim, too, that by some mysterious supernatural process they have experienced such a change of nature, such a regeneration of character, such a sanctification of mind and heart as fits them to be the mouth-pieces of God, and the leaders and instructors of mankind. But of what use is it for them to pretend to any superior sanctity, when all intelligent men know, and all the world ought to know, that they "are men of like passions as others," that they have the same appetites, passions, desires, faults and foibles that all men have. The criminal records of the country prove, that in proportion to their numbers no class of educated men furnish a greater number of the inmates of our jails and prisons than the clergy.

Now there are in the United States nearly fifty thousand clergymen. We would utilize this element of society. That portion of them who, by their education, talents and moral worth are qualified for the work, we would have converted into teachers in our schools and seminaries of learning, public lecturers and leaders of the people in the great work of reform. We would have them teach their fellow men on those subjects about which they have some positive knowledge, and in relation to which it is of the utmost importance that they be informed. We would have them teach the people to know themselves, to do their own thinking, to form their own opinions, to understand the laws of their own nature, and the conditions on which the prosperity and happiness of human beings depend. We would place them on a level with the rest of mankind, give them the same chances, the same opportunities, and let them depend on themselves, instead of being merely dependents upon others. As for the rest, we would have them expend the force and energy which they now spend for naught in some branches of trade, or agriculture, and thereby make themselves a blessing to the world.

To this, or something like this, it must come at last. The people will not always suffer themselves to be hoodwinked to their own destruction. A revolt is sure to come, and when it does come it is to be hoped that the crimes of the priesthood against humanity will not be too vividly remembered against them, and that the sins of their predecessors who lived in the dead past will not be visited on those who exist in the living present.

Religion is natural to man. It is not an exotic which must be grafted upon him, but is indigenous in the soil of his heart and mind. God has endowed him with religious faculties which seek gratification. It is only necessary to develop and properly direct the religious powers to make him all that religion requires. Man's religious faculties, like all his other faculties, are liable to be misdirected. He possesses no appetite, no passion, no faculty that is not in itself good. All that is wrong in man consists in the perversion or abuse of powers which are in themselves good. When his religious faculties are properly directed, they tend to good, and only good, both to himself and his fellow men. When misdirected they are liable to produce an incalculable amount of mischief. It is a law of nature that the very best things are capable of being converted into the very worst. Thus it is that religion when perverted may become a curse to its possessor and render him a curse to the world. Woe to the world when a religious fanatic or monomaniac is let loose in it! Conceiving that he only has God's truth, and that the salvation of the world depends upon the universal acceptance of it by men, and that all who do not accept it are the enemies of God and religion, he goes forth full of bigotry and intolerance, scattering firebrands, arrows and death in the world, and denounces the thunderbolts of God's wrath upon all he deems to be God's foes. Animated by a zeal without knowledge, he has no mercy on others, nor even on himself. He will endure privations, encounter the greatest difficulties, brave the most imminent dangers, bid defiance to tortures, eagerly shed his blood or lay down his life to seal his testimony. He may be compared to a lion uncaged, a tiger unchained, a hyena let loose.

To be truly religious is to be God-like in character and disposition. To be merciful and mild, peaceable and kind, charitable toward all, forbearing and forgiving even toward enemies. Religion is true manhood. To be religious is to be a well developed man, a true gentleman, a lover of all men, both good and bad. The distinction between good and bad men is only a difference of degree. None are completely good, none are entirely bad. Human nature is the same in all men, but is manifested in a variety of ways. The human race furnishes one of the best illustrations of the law of unity in variety. The difference in the character and disposition of men is a difference of organization, temperament, education, climate and condition. Men may be found, even in civilized society, in all the intermediate stages of development between the lowest barbarism and the highest civilization. In proportion as a man is wicked he is barbarous, in proportion as he is good he is civilized. Notwithstanding the diversity of character and action among men, all are prompted to action by one grand leading motive, the desire of happiness and the dread of misery. Men seek happiness in a variety of ways, and commit many blunders and mistakes in their efforts to obtain it. The good find it, the bad miss it.

The Christian deludes himself if he supposes that he is actuated by motives any different from those of other men. If he renounces what he supposes to be the pleasures of this world for the sake of the glory and bliss of eternity, he has made a good bargain, he has looked out for number one. The balance of profit and loss is decidedly in his favor. No shrewd Yankee could hope to make a better bargain. If the wicked expect to find happiness in sin, they commit a capital mistake, which, sooner or later, it is to be hoped they will discover and correct. The good are to be congratulated on account of their goodness, the bad are to be commiserated on account of their badness. We are, therefore, to have "compassion on the ignorant and those who are out of the way." We are to be as God is, "kind even to the unthankful and the evil."

Is this religion a grievous burden on men? No, it is no burden at all. Is its yoke heavy? No yoke about it. Is it hard to practice? Far from it. Will it make our pleasures less on earth? It will greatly enhance and increase them. Will the practice of it subject us to the scorn and derision of ungodly men? "Who is he that will harm you if you be a follower of that which is good?" No; even the vilest of men are so constituted by nature that they cannot but respect virtue, honesty, goodness, and those who practice these virtues, whether they themselves practice them or not.

The truly religious man, freed from every vestige of superstition, full of confidence in God and human nature, views this life as a school, a state of discipline for the development of the powers and faculties of man. He believes that for this purpose man has been subjected to many and grievous evils, but that nevertheless, there is much more happiness than misery in the world, more virtue than vice, more good than evil. Evil in his view is but the shadow of good. "There will be briars where berries grow." If we have the good we must take the evil also. Error he conceives to have no existence except in the opinions of men. Outside the human mind there are no errors, no mistakes. Error has no basis in nature, no solid foundation to rest on. It, like evil, may be outgrown. The error of to-day may be supplanted, extinguished, annihilated by the truth of to-morrow. It is, therefore, transient, evanescent, passing away. So with evil. There is no absolute evil in the Universe. Every stage of human existence has its apparent evils. The ignorance, dependence and helplessness of infancy and youth are outgrown when we come to be men. The evils connected with manhood we are relieved from in old age, and the evils incident to old age are terminated by death. We may hope that the evils of our present state of existence will not follow us into another and higher mode of existence. Whether evils of any kind will exist in that life is more than we can tell. But if they do, we may be sure that the Being who has so guarded the interests of his creatures here, that none of us can suffer only a certain amount of pain without its terminating in death, will so protect his creatures there, as to render their existence a blessing and not a curse. God's ways are perfect. "He hath done all things well." He has so established the order of the moral world as that no virtue can be unrewarded, no vice unpunished. The man who inflicts an injury on his fellow man, at the same time inflicts a much greater one on himself. It is better to be slandered than to slander, to be stolen from than to steal, to be murdered than to murder, "to suffer wrong than to do wrong." Nature knows nothing about forgiveness in the sense of the remission of retribution, nothing about inflicting punishment upon the innocent for the sins of the guilty; nothing about atoning for sin by shedding the blood of innocent victims. On the contrary the great law of Nature is, "he that doeth wrong shall suffer for the wrong which he hath done", and there is no respect of persons."

It is not for us to say who are the proper objects of God's righteous retribution, nor who should be the recipients of his blessings. We know but little about ourselves, and still less about our fellow men. We cannot determine the amount of guilt or innocence of a single human being. It ill becomes us to presume to sit in judgment on our fellows. God only can be the proper judge, and "the judge of all the earth will do right." It is for us to look with charity upon all men, to encourage them who are in the right way, and to pity those who do wrong.

The true religionist rises to the conception that the human race constitutes a brotherhood, that we all have one Father, all belong to one Church—the Church of Humanity; that we are all teachers, and at the same time learners in that Church, that the Bible of Nature includes all books, all objects, all sounds, all thoughts and all sensations. That the rites and ceremonies of this Church consist in doing good to all men as we have opportunity. The whole duty of man consists in doing all the good he can, and as little harm as possible.

In regard to futurity, the philosophic religionist realizes that all that relates to the future, beyond the present moment, must be included in the domain of the unknown. Aside from the accounts both ancient and modern of the reappearance of persons in the spirit who were known to have lived and died on earth—accounts which are believed by some and discredited by others—the veil which separates the future life from the present has never been lifted, much less removed. The question "if a man die shall he live again" has been as thoroughly investigated and discussed as any other. Able, learned, and good men have advocated both sides of the question. Whenever a people emerge from a condition of ignorance and semi-barbarism doubters and unbelievers appear among them, the number increases in the ratio that intelligence is diffused, and civilization, culture and refinement are promoted. Belief is the most general among those who think and know the least on the subject. Doubt is almost exclusively confined to thinking, intelligent, well-informed men. We draw no inference from this, but simply state the fact.

If we analyze and criticize the argument usually relied on to prove a future life, it is plain that they are inconclusive and unsatisfactory except to those who are resolutely determined to cling to a belief in it without regard to argument or evidence. To the calm enquirer whose mind is regulated by evidence in believing, and who has no desire to believe anything but what is true, however pleasing and agreeable the belief may be, they will be seen to be mere inferences, often from premises which are wholly absurd, or deductions from premises which do not warrant the conclusion.

No argument in its favor is more frequently appealed to, nor more generally relied on, than that founded on the desire of men for immortality, and the happy influence of a belief in it. It is surprising that well-informed men can delude themselves with an argument like this. Who does not know that the hopes as well as the fears of mankind can be as readily excited by fiction as by fact. And who does not know that the idle fancies of our childhood days are dispelled by age and experience? In like manner stern truths of logic and philosophy dissipate the ideal fancies of our maturer years.

On the other hand it is impossible to prove that there is no future life. The utmost that unbelievers can do is to nullify the arguments of the believer by demonstrating their entire fallacy. The question then relates to the unknown, if not to the unknowable. It opens a wide field for the imagination to roam in. All our thoughts on the subject are purely ideal and subjective. That they are not reliable is proved by the fact that the conceptions of different persons are in direct contradiction. To person who abound in hope, the picture of the future will appear painted in the most gorgeous colors; to those in whom fear predominates it will present only the blackness of darkness forever.

The influence of the belief in the doctrine in question will depend on the character and disposition of the believer, and the form in which it is held. In calculating its influence upon character, it is necessary to keep in view the following facts. 1. No speculative opinion has the power to change the nature of man. 2. The natural character and disposition of men being dependent on organization and temperament can be effected but very little by their opinions. The utmost that opinion can do, is to call into exercise feelings and sentiments which already exist (in a latent condition perhaps) in the individual, and give direction to his actions. 3. So much stronger is the natural character than opinion, that men often act in a manner entirely inconsistent with their belief. Men are not in character and disposition what they are, because they believe as they do. Hence we have good and bad men of all forms of belief, of all sects and of no sect. A good man will be good in spite of his belief, however bad; a bad man will be bad in spite of his belief, however good. Belief is not a sure index of character, but conduct is. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is the best test that can be applied.

The doctrine of a future life is held in a great variety of forms. In some of its phases it is comparatively harmless. But in the form in which it has been, and is now most popular in the world, if it is capable of doing some good, it is also capable of doing, and has done an immense amount of mischief. No doctrine, whatever, appeals with more power to the hopes and fears of mankind, or is better calculated to stir their emotions, and call into exercise all the feelings of their nature. When we consider how general has been the belief in it, and how much it has been enforced and enlarged upon, it is truly wonderful that its influence has not been much greater than it has. It can only be accounted for on the supposition that its most intelligent believers have not more than half believed it, and that the ignorant multitude have accepted and endorsed it, without at all comprehending its full import and meaning. In the opinion of the writer its influence for good has been very generally overestimated, while its power to do harm has not been realized by the many, and has been perhaps exaggerated by the few.

In contemplating the subject, we have often wondered why men do not more generally view it in the light of reason and common sense.

A conscious existence after death is something about which all knowledge is withheld from us. If knowledge on the subject would be a blessing, it would not be withheld. We may, therefore, conclude that it is best for us to be ignorant in relation to it. We have been pushed into being by a power over which we have no control. This power, if it knows anything, knows a great deal better than we do whether it is best for us to live another life or not. If it is best, we shall certainly live again. If it is not best it is folly for us to desire it. The best course for us to pursue, then, is to moderate our desires, and to banish all anxious thoughts upon the subject. Anxious thought, even, in relation to the to-morrow of our present life was condemned by the teacher, Christ; why should we be more anxious about another life? It was a noblesaying of the great Spinoza, "the free man thinks not of death, but only of life." The great question for each one of us is not, shall I live and be happy to-morrow or next year, or in another state of existence, but do I live and am I happy to-day?

Those who embrace the popular view may boast, as they are wont to do, about the superiority of their faith; but who has the most confidence in the Supreme Power, he who is willing to trust his destiny, both for time and eternity, to Nature's disposal, or he who is constantly troubled and anxious in regard to what final disposition is to be made of him? We know our present existence terminates in death, but we do not know, nor have we good reason to believe, that death is an evil, unless it be an evil not to exist. But if it is an evil not to exist, what a monstrous and inconceivable evil has been endured by every individual of the human race, in that, during the incalculable lapse of time before our existence here, we had no existence. At most, death can only put us back into the same condition we were before our existence here. Not to be, can be no evil, but life, if it is a miserable life, is an evil for which there is no remedy but death. Neither life, nor death is an entity. Both are phenomenal. Death is the absence of life, or the negation of life. Nothing is more natural than death. Life and death are intimately connected. They run parallel with each other. We no sooner begin to live than we commence to die. Death pervades every kingdom in nature. Man, beasts, birds, fishes, insects, vegetables, all alike are subject to the dominion of death. Can it be that a thing so natural, so common, so universal can be an evil? For aught we know, life cannot exist in finite beings only in connection with death. Death is not a force. If life is a force, it is far more rational to find fault with life rather than death, in much as life deserts us at last and consigns us to the condition of death. Nothing serves better to illustrate the pernicious influence of false education than the fact that that which men most dread and fear of all things on earth has the least power to do them harm.

It may be objected that this view leaves us in uncertainty in regard to the future. But is there not the same uncertainty in relation to everything that is future to the present moment? We know that we live to-day, we do not know that we shall to-morrow nor next year. When we close our eyes in sleep we are not certain that we shall ever be aroused from our slumber. However certain the believer may be that he shall live again after death, he is not certain in regard to what his doom may be in that life, or if he is, his mind must be in painful uncertainty in regard to the doom of others.

Again it may be said, that, however plausible our view may be, it is at least safer to adopt the popular belief. If we proceed on the principle here indicated, our only safety lies in taking refuge in the bosom of the Catholic Church. The truth is, our true safety consists in being honest with ourselves, and true to our own convictions. He who pursues any other course is either a slave, or a hypocrite and knave. Honesty is the mark of nobleness and manhood, and will carry a man triumphantly through life, through death, and through any life that may await him in the future. The motto of every rational man should be this: "The best possible security for the future is a wise improvement of the present." Once more: It may be objected that according to our common-sense view of the doctrine of a future life, for anything we know to the contrary, death may terminate the existence of man forever, and this is rather a gloomy view of human destiny.

There are four prominent views of the destiny of man, which it may be well to state and view in contrast. The first supposes that at death, man is resolved into his original elements, and is, so far as personal consciousness and identity are concerned, as though he had never been. One common destiny awaits the human race. In the grave all ranks are leveled, the king lies as low as the beggar, and all distinctions are done away. If we are insensible to happiness, we are also beyond the reach of sorrow, suffering and pain. If we suffer a loss by death, it is a loss of which we shall be forever entirely unconscious. That this view is not as cheering as we are capable of conceiving we have no disposition to deny.

The next view is, that there is to be a future life to be enjoyed by a portion of the human race, while by far the largest portion are to be annihilated forever.

The third view admits a future life for all, but contends that while it will be a life of blessedness to a comparative few, to untold millions it will be a life of inconceivable wretchedness and woe.

The last view supposes that the future life will ultimately result in the endless enjoyment and happiness of all mankind.

The first view may be somewhat gloomy, but it is sustained by all human observation and experience. The second may be a little less gloomy, but that is all that can be claimed in its favor. On the ground of reason, we can see no good cause for thinking that there is a sufficient difference between the best man that ever lived and the worst one, to make an infinite difference in their destiny. The third has a bright side, but it has also a dark side. And the dark side is so inexpressibly horrible and revolting as to obscure even its bright side. It does not become its advocates to object to the first view, on account of its gloominess, so long as their view is so much more liable to the same objection. If the fourth view could be sustained by a sufficient amount of evidence, no possible objection could lie against it. All it lacks is the proof. Reason sees that the order of nature is, that whatever has a beginning must have an end. Immortality can be predicted only of that which has had no beginning in time. And as man, as a conscious, thinking being, had a beginning in time, so in time he must have an end. It cannot be denied, however, that the same power that conferred existence upon us, may do so again; but whether it will or not, is more than we mortals at present know.

Reader, if you are morbidly sensitive on the question of immortality, you may not like the views above presented. Very well, my friend, you are at liberty to seek for better, and to find them if you can, but I beg of you not to deem me your enemy because I tell you what I believe to be the truth.

Wishing you, and all my readers, health, prosperity and happiness I bid you adieu.

[THE END.]

Spirit—Life and Matter Considered.

Life and matter have a co-existence; one could not be, if the other was not. All life from the monad or infusoria of the Sea to that of the highest individualized intelligence is the same in principle. Intelligence—knowledge—consciousness result from combinations of different elements of matter.

Ignorance, crime, and evils of whatever kind, or character, to which man and all subordinate conditions of life existing, are immediately traceable to the different combinations of the same matter, and each individual species demonstrates its indulgence in just and exact proportions to the various elements entering into its physical form; as is the combinations so is the form, in its physical expression. Man absorbs all the elements of subordinate life and conditions—and that which has control, by its greater amount, indicates the animal form from which he has received it. His mind and actions are in conformity with the nature of such elements, and his every act proves the worth of this philosophy, dispute who can.

Whatever has a beginning under the operation of nature's laws, must, of necessity, end under the operation of the same laws. Spirit, whatever that may be, can have no individuality only as it is connected with matter. Every molecule of matter possesses in itself, inherently, attraction for that for which it has an affinity, and repels that for which it has not. Through the operation of this law worlds were brought into being, and all forms and demonstrations of life result from the same great law.

If the earth could be thrown into a vapor by retorting it, such vapor instead of flying off into space, would hold its relative position to the planetary system, and would revolve around the sun as it does now; while the elements would, under the vitalization of their own inherent force, slowly condense from the nebulous to the opaque condition, from a cloud-like appearance of a million miles in diameter to a rounded globe of sufficient density to reflect the light of the sun. But millions of years would necessarily elapse before it would be sufficiently condensed to be productive of water in which would appear the first indications of life.

Spiritualists are in harmony with their orthodox brethren in as much as they hold that mankind can be good, kind, and charitable, if they so will, or indulge in every crime known to the criminal calendar. This untenable belief has been in almost, if not quite, every age the belief of mankind. It is certainly strange how any one, who dares to reason from nature's laws, can credit such a wrong.

Mankind is the effect of a cause existing in the laws of nature, and must therefore be, and ever is subject to the law that gave him being, and must of necessity be what the cause made him to be.

I would therefore ask how the effects can take precedence of the cause, and in the development of this spirit of life, gendered and born of matter, become a power controlling the source of its being?

Nature absolute, self-existent, and supreme, produces and destroys the works of her own hands, and the elements through which vitalized life gave evidence of nature's power through the combinations of matter is dissolved, and the vitalizing principle in that combination of matter, forever ceases with it. Where then is the individuality of the spirit? "Dissolved, and forever like dew in the foam."

GERMAN critics assert that there never was an Italian who had inspiration. Hitherto Italy has passed as the land of genius, with sons jumping to conclusions without much effort; while Germans were set down as dilligent students prosaically plodding along into their findings. It turns out now that Galileo, Columbus, Volta, Dante, and Raphael were the plodders; Humboldt, Klopstock, Liebig, Wagner, and Moltke the inspirationists.

JONAH AND THE BIG FISH.

Among all the pious stories to be found in that remarkable collection of wonderful tales—the old Jew-book—probably none have oftener been referred to than the one giving an account of Jonah and the whale. Fishermen, like sailors, have from time immemorial been noted as great story-tellers. Their “yarns” and adventures have been so incredible that they have passed into a proverb. To such extent has it been thought that fishermen’s and sailors’ stories are extremely apocryphal, that where an incredible tale or impossible yarn has been spun that nobody could believe, it has, by common consent, been denominated “fishy,” or a “fish story.” Among this large class of stories, Jonah and the whale, stands pre-eminent, the fishiest of all. Yet we are still required to believe it, and it is still, Sunday after Sunday, preached from the pulpit, because it is bound up in the “holy book” which we are repeatedly assured contains “the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.”

We have no idea by whom the story was written, where it was written, or when it was written. It may have been 500 years, 1000 years, or 2000 years before Christ. In fact, it matters very little where it was written, when, or by whom; it makes no difference with its veracity or credibility. If it is truth it depends not upon its narrator, and if it is false, all the saints in the calendar cannot make it true.

Our hero is first introduced to us as a prophet, and son of Amittai. Who Amittai was we do not know, nor where he came from. We are told that the word of the Lord came unto Jonah, saying, “Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry out against it.” In that age of the world the word of God seemed to seek out particular individuals and was not free alike to all. This was one of the very few cases where the God of the Jews seemed to take the slightest interest in the people of a heathen nation; the Jews appearing to require and occupy all his time and attention. He was not only wholly indifferent as to what became of the outside barbarians—the nations that were not Jews—but he seemed ever to be plotting against them, venting his spite upon them and continually aiding his special people to slaughter and destroy them. But in this case the wickedness of Nineveh troubled him greatly, and he made an unusual effort to reclaim them from their wickedness.

Jonah seemed to be a disobedient prophet, and was much like the ungoverned children in this age of the world, who when told to do a certain thing do directly the opposite. Thus Jonah instead of going to Nineveh started for Tarshish where he could get away from the presence of the Lord. Where in the world Tarshish is, or was, no geographer has been able to determine, but wherever it was, God seems not to have visited it, for by going there Jonah was to escape his presence. The prophet proceeded to Joppa where he took passage on a boat in the Tarshish and Joppa line and paid his fare like a man. In this particular we place him ahead of the prophets and priests of our own time, when they travel by boat or by rail they either want to go at half-price or be dead-headed through. Jonah was no dead-head.

He was destined, however, to have an unpleasant voyage, for the Lord is said to have sent a great wind and brought on a mighty tempest so that the ship was in danger of being wrecked, and the sailors became alarmed. It is not likely this wind was sent from the Lord in any other sense than all winds may be said to come from him. Wind is the result of natural causes. The rarification of the atmosphere in some localities produced by heat, the cold air rushing in from other quarters to fill the vacuum together with the electrical or magnetic conditions of the atmosphere are what produces currents, breezes, gales, tempests, hurricanes, tornadoes, and cyclones which are more or less severe, according to the conditions which rule at the time. In the heated portions of the earth, in the vicinity of the equator, these intense commotions of the atmosphere greatly abound; while in those regions approaching the poles, far less so. If a destructive storm visits any locality, and does any amount of damage, it is short sightedness, ignorance, and superstition which induces people to attribute it to the anger or vindictiveness of God. It only shows they do not understand the forces which control the Universe, and which produce every result that takes place now, or ever has taken place.

Our man Jonah was doubtless well fitted for a sailor, without at all heeding the severity of the storm and though unused to being on water, he was neither sea-sick nor alarmed. “He went down into the side of the ship” and went fast asleep, while all this commotion and terror prevailed around him. He must have been a regular stoic—a man of remarkable equanimity of mind to be thus wholly unaffected by the danger and the fury of the storm. It proves, at all events, that his conscience, for trying to get away from the presence of the Lord, was not troubling him severely. The captain of the vessel, however, in his great fear, hunted around and found Jonah and waked him up, and asked him what he meant, to be sleeping at such a time, and told him he ought to be awake, crying to God to save them from destruction. After the sailors had been some time engaged in throwing overboard such freight and luggage as would lighten the vessel, they concluded to cast lots to see which man among them had caused this terrible storm; as though a man could cause it; as though casting lots would indicate with any certainty which man it was. They must have been ignorant and illy-informed people indeed, fully illustrating the superstition which characterizes sailors even to this day. As well might we now try murderers, thieves and incendiaries by drawing straws, throwing dice, playing cards, or flipping pennies. It would be merely gambling to ascertain whether a man was guilty or not—the most uncertain of all ways to establish guilt or innocence.

Of course the lot fell upon our poor Jonah; the story could not otherwise have run in the right channel and the grand denouement could not have been as desired by the writer. The ignorant sailors felt positive, of course, that Jonah was the man who had caused the mischief, and they immediately interrogated him as to who he was, where he came from, what people he belonged to, and what he followed for a business. Jonah answered their questions in a truthful manner, at which the men became still more afraid, and asked why he had done as he had, and censured him for his base conduct.

It strikes us that this novel trial of a quiet stranger, by the crew of a ship in the height of a raging tempest, when it would be supposed every man would be required to take care of the ship—to man the vessel, to reef the sails, to cut away the masts, if necessary, and to do the many other things needful to be done in such an emergency, was indeed a most singular and most improbable proceeding; but it belongs to the “big fish story,” and we must take it for granted that it was “all exactly so.”

When the court which tried Jonah and found him guilty enquired of him what punishment should be executed upon him for being guilty of having the lot fall upon him, he answered like a brave, self-sacrificing fellow, and said: “Take me up and cast me forth into the sea.” We insist, there have been few men in any age of the world who would have shown, under the circumstances, such a disregard for self and personal safety. Our opinion of Jonah is elevated, and he certainly was too good a man to be used for fish-bait. But they cast him into the sea and it immediately became very calm. He was the oil cast upon the troubled waters, and his being thrown into the surging billows seems to have had a very pacifying effect upon God, and he calmed the winds and stilled the waters at once. Is it to be supposed that the casting of a prophet or priest overboard in this age of the world will still a tempest or calm a storm? Are not the laws which govern the Universe ever the same?

But how about Jonah? What became of him? Why, a big fish, which providentially happened to be on the spot, “took the stranger in” out of the wet, where he could finish his nap at his leisure. As Jonah had such a happy faculty of adapting himself to surrounding circumstances, it may be supposed that his new birth was just to his taste. It was snug at all events.

The book of Jonah, with its forty-eight verses, all told, does not inform us what kind of a fish it was that took charge of the Prophet; but Jesus afterwards said it was a whale; and the original story says God prepared the fish for the purpose. If it was a whale, he must have prepared him, for naturalists inform us that the true whale cannot take anything into its mouth and swallow it larger than four inches through. God must have “prepared” the mouth and throat of that particular whale pretty extensively by stretching it and enlarging it, to enable him to swallow a man at a gulp. A shark could soon dispatch a prophet, but would probably “chaw” him up pretty badly first, and it is to be feared in such a case, even with God’s help, the man would not be of much use three days afterwards.

It might be imagined that though Jonah had landed safely in the stomach of the fish, that it would have been difficult for him to have found air enough there to sustain him for three days. If the fish had kept his mouth and throat constantly open, so as to let air in, it would not have answered, for the water would also have rushed in and drowned the poor Prophet at last. How he obtained air to breathe, and to enable him to keep up a three days cry to his God, is not satisfactorily explained. A rubber hose extending from the fish’s stomach to the open air above the surface of the water, after the plan of a diving bell, would have been very convenient, but we have no right to suppose God provided such an apparatus.

Notwithstanding the extreme improbability of the truth of this fish story, it is amusing to see how easy it is for our Christian friends to believe it. It does not stagger them at all. If the book had said Jonah swallowed the whale, or half a dozen of them, for that matter, they could easily swallow it, Jonah, whales and all. There is no limit to their credulity and faith.

Fishes have astonishing digestive powers, and whatever is taken into their stomachs is usually “ground up” or digested in a short time. Under this state of things, it is a marvel how Jonah could have for three days escaped the strong digestive functions of the big fish. He must have been a “tough cuss,” or the Lord must have “prepared” the fish’s stomach, as he had previously “prepared” its mouth and gullet. Fish, also, are a hungry, voracious race, and as this big fish did not digest Jonah, and had no room for any other food for three days, he would naturally become very hungry. And Jonah, too, poor fellow, getting nothing to eat for over three days, he must have become quite hungry also, thus shut up in the dark. Probably God “prepared” Jonah so the fish could not digest him, and “prepared” the fish so he should not become too hungry, and “prepared” Jonah’s stomach likewise, and for the same reason. This was, by the way, considerable of an enterprise, the Lord took upon himself on that occasion. There were several points to which he had to direct his attention. As an experiment or an adventure, it was probably quite amusing to him.

We are glad to be informed that after God had punished Jonah until he was satisfied for the disobedience indulged, that he “just spoke to the fish,” and the words immediately acted as an emetic, and caused the fish to throw up Jonah on dry land, as good as ever. This experience was of much value to the prophet and he proceeded without delay to do the missionary work allotted him. He went to the exceeding great city of Nineveh which was three days journey across it, and cried out: “Yet in forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown.” His prophecy seems to have had a marvelous effect, and the king soon issued orders that neither man nor beast should eat or drink anything, and that they should all be covered with sackcloth.

A few points to wonder at, and a few questions naturally arise in connection with this subject.

1st. How could a foreigner, as Jonah was in that city, and who spoke a different language, succeed in making himself understood by the populace?

2d. How could a single man preach effectually to a city of such immense dimensions, without spending months to accomplish it?

3d. Why should the Ninevites who worshiped Baal, and who never heard of Jehovah, become so greatly frightened when Jonah visited them that they should so readily abandon their own God and accept Jonah's? It was certainly the most effectual missionary work ever accomplished. Nowadays it takes several missionaries, several thousands of dollars, and sometimes a year's time, to convert a single heathen, and he often don't stay converted; but here this man Jonah converted a large, populous city in a short time, unaided and alone.

4th. Where could so much sackcloth be found to cover all the men and women, and beasts also? Some of the merchants must have had an immense stock of sackcloth on hand.

5th. How is it that sackcloth has such a pacifying effect upon God? How does it operate upon his anger, his indignation, and his determination?

6th. Why should he prefer sackcloth as a garment for men, to any other kind of goods? Why should the beasts also be covered with sackcloth? Had they offended God, that they should repent before him?

7th. How could life be sustained if the people and the beasts were forbidden to eat or drink? What harm would there be in horses and asses taking food?

Many such questions will arise in the minds of the skeptical and those of little faith, but your true believer takes it all in without a question or a doubt. "Blessed are they who believe all they are told, for they shall always be easily imposed upon."

The most agreeable part of the story is, that the Ninevites quit their evil ways, and that God changed his mind about destroying them; or, in other words, that he did not keep the cruel promise he had made. A bad promise is always better broken than kept. But this course of God's made Jonah very angry. After he had prophesied that the city should be destroyed, he wanted the destruction to come without failure or postponement on account of the weather, or any other reason, and rather than the people should not be destroyed he preferred to die himself. He retired from the city and made a booth on the east side, where he could sit in the shade, and see if God would do what he agreed to do.

The Lord seemed to take a little pity on Jonah and caused a gourd to grow up in a single night so as to shade the disappointed Prophet, but even in this he changed his mind again, for as soon as he found Jonah was exceedingly glad of the gourd, he "prepared" a worm to eat it and to make it wither and die. Thus, according to the accounts we get, God is alternately sending blessings and curses—pleasing or displeasing. He makes us glad one day with something, that is almost sure to be destroyed the next day, thus, making us sad.

The finale of this fish story is well known. Nineveh was not destroyed. The sackcloth, the fasting, and the ashes saved it, and caused God to place a higher value upon the more than six score of thousand souls who were in the city, who could not discern their right hand from their left, also "much cattle." It was so frequent that he destroyed thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, and even seventy thousand human beings at a time for trifling provocations, that it is refreshing to find that he sometimes exercised mercy. But we regret to think that his anger toward the Ninevites did not continue to be appeased, for though he relented on that occasion, it was but a short time before the city was destroyed for a certainty. According to the chronological notes of the Bible, Jonah prophesied 860 years before Christ, and according to Diodorus' history, Nineveh was destroyed by Arbaces, the Mede, 876 years before Christ, which was sixteen years before Jonah's preaching saved it. These little discrepancies, however, must not disturb us. "All things" you know "are possible," etc.

What became of Jonah we are not told. Our opinion is, that after that adventure he kept away from the water. If another fish got after him, and swallowed him, we have no account that it vomited him forth, and it is more than probable that his body, or portions of it, became, like this story, fish, fishy.

The principal use made by our Christian friends of this remarkable fish story, is, that it was such a grand symbol or prototype of the death, burial and resurrection of the "blessed Savior." The quotation from Matthew (xii. 40) is well remembered, when Jesus says, "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." But here again is a slight discrepancy, Jesus, according to the record, was not three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. He was placed in the tomb on Friday night, and Sunday morning he was up bright and early, only one day and two nights, the most that can be made of it. Thus his own words were proved untrue. It has been suggested, however, that he might have found the heart of the earth so uncomfortably hot, that he did not wish to stay there his time out. Scientists assure us, the centre of the earth is a molten mass of dense, fused, super-heated metals, hotter than any furnace that can be conceived of. If this is so—and it seems very probable—it would not be a comfortable place to stay in for three days and nights. When we bear in mind, however, that it is four thousand miles to the heart of the earth and four thousand miles back again, we may well suppose he could not stay there very long and make the trip in thirty-six hours from the time he started. Verily, verily, which story is the hardest to believe, the "fish story," or the "heart of the earth story?"

Twenty-five cents will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Oct. 1st, to Jan. 1st 1876, and three tracts thrown in. Send in the names of Friends and Enquirers who ought to read the paper, but do not, that they may thus secure lots of good reading matter for 25 cents.

"THE TOUCHSTONE" is the name of a new, brilliant, literary, dramatic, and musical Weekly, which has just made its debut upon the public stage. It is edited by our friend Jas. McCarroll, and whatever he undertakes to do, is well done. It will be first class in every sense of the word. It is published at No. 2 Clinton Place, at $2 a year. We wish it a long and prosperous life.

NOTHING LIKE IT, OR STEPS TO THE KINGDOM. By Lois Waisbrocker; published by Colby & Rich, Boston; is a sprightly, ably written romance, and is well calculated to induce a favorable consideration of the Radical reforms of the day. Those who have read the other works of this author will not need to be told that she writes in a charming and most instructive manner. Bound in cloth, 12mo. 336 pages, price $1.50, postage 18 cents.

DANGER SIGNALS.—An address on the uses and abuses of modern Spiritualism, by Mary F. Davis, is the title of a very sensible, well-written pamphlet, just issued by the publishing house of A. J. Davis & Co. Its object is to show the dangers, errors and hurtful tendencies which are menacing Spiritualism—the mistakes which some are running into, and the fallacies which are being imbibed. Our Spiritualistic friends will be pleased with it. We have not learned the price, but judge it to be 20 cents, post-paid.

WE HOPE our correspondents will still be patient with us. We have many communications on hand which we wish to lay before our readers as soon as we can find room for them. We have many that are excellent and worthy a place in our columns, but our space is limited. It is not always because communications do not please us that they do not appear, but because we cannot possibly insert all. Let us have patience and "fight it out on this line" if it takes a lifetime.

THE BURGESS-UNDERWOOD DEBATE, held at Aylmer, Ont., June 29th and 30th, and July 1st and 2nd, 1875 between Prof. O. A. Burgess, President of the N. W. Christian University, at Indianapolis, and B. F. Underwood, the American champion of Free Thought. We have this work now in press and it will be ready to deliver in two weeks. It is a full report of a four days exciting debate between the gentlemen named, affording a fair exhibit of what can be said on both sides of the great theological questions of the day.

The Propositions discussed were: 1st. "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of Divine origin." Burgess affirming; Underwood denying.

2d, Proposition, "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings, regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood affirming; Burgess denying.

The whole makes some 200 pages. In paper, sixty cents; cloth $1.00. Let those wishing the book send in their orders. Every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER ought to have a copy of the work.

Truth Seeker Leaflets.

We give in this connection samples of these little Leaflets, consisting of two pages each, of terse, sharp and trenchant reading matter, suitable to hand to friends, neighbors or any who are willing to read, which we have been induced to get up and furnish to patrons at very low prices, so as to enable them to buy freely, and to circulate bountifully. Some of them are original, and some, selections.

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS are fast becoming a popular institution for circulating Liberal sentiments and opinions. They contain from four to seventy-five pages each, at varying prices, from one to ten cents each, with a liberal discount to those who buy in quantity. We are receiving orders every day for the Tracts, and would be pleased to have still much larger numbers of them circulated among those seeking and needing light.

For many years we have been so accustomed to having "Brimstone" and "Damnation" tracts stuck under our noses, which we have almost been compelled to read, until the very fumes of sulphur have reached our olfactories and offended our senses, that it is time we returned the compliment. Let us circulate TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS and TRUTH SEEKER LEAFLETS until our orthodox friends get some glimmerings of truth, common sense and reason into their obtuse minds. No one person can alone do this to any great extent, but if many join together the burden will be easy and the labor light.

The LEAFLETS are shorter than any of the TRACTS, and will often be read when books, pamphlets and tracts would not. They are put up assorted, and sent, post-paid, at the following prices: 4 cents per dozen; 25 cents per hundred, or $2 per thousand. When rates of postage are reduced, they can be sent cheaper. We have gotten up, to start with, some sixteen varieties, and more will be added from time to time if the enterprise is duly encouraged.

It is our wish to furnish Liberal, Freethought reading matter at very reasonable prices, and that the Liberal public will duly appreciate our efforts in this direction. We have sometimes thought we had occasion to feel that a portion of our readers are too apathetic to our appeals and to our needs for aid. We do not ask for donations, (though we have not yet been known to refuse any,) but we do ask our friends to not forget us, and that we need money to conduct the business we have in hand.

There is on our List considerable over two thousand names, more or less in arrears, and many for a year and a half. This is not right. So great a number should not ask us to carry them along. We are not able to do it. Our last dollar was long ago put into the enterprise in which our heart and soul are enlisted, and we now have to depend upon the legitimate receipts of our business, and it sometimes feels hard that so many should show so much indifference.

An honored portion of our patrons are prompt and ready to respond. Let such accept our grateful thanks. We cannot forget their kindness. But those of you whose time has expired, and who have not renewed, please consider that we are addressing you personally. We ask you to renew without delay. We are in need of money, now. A year's subscription is not very much to any individual, but in the aggregate they are a great deal to us. It is easy for you all to see when your time expires, by the little

The "Design Argument" Considered.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

[Taken from his third speech in his debate with the Rev. John Marples of Toronto, Ont., and held in Napance, Canada, July, 1875. It is believed to contain a complete refutation of the argument—a posteriori for a personal Deity.]

I now come to the design argument, and will give it all the consideration it deserves. I do not think he gave it satisfactorily. That there is an intelligent being who created and governed the universe, it is said, is evident to every thinking mind. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." The order, harmony, and adaptation, observable in nature, it is said, prove design; design is evidence of a designer, and a designer must be an intelligent being. It is absurd, we are told, to suppose that this orderly world, containing such admirable adaptations of means to ends, can exist independently of a Being who made and governs it. Nothing could have come by chance, it is said, and therefore it is inferred that this universe must have been created by a God.

Let us view this famous argument for a moment. God is something or nothing. To say he is nothing, is to say there is no God. If he is something, he is not merely a property or quality, but an existence per se—an entity, a substance, whether material or immaterial is unimportant. If he is a substance, a material, or Spiritual Being, there must be order, harmony, and adaptation or fitness, in his divine nature, to enable him to perceive, reflect, design, and execute his plans. If Deity does not reason, does not cogitate, but perceives truth without the labor of investigation and contrivance, he must still possess an adaptation or fitness thus to perceive, as well as to execute his designs.

To say God is without order, harmony and adaptation or fitness, is to say he is a mere chaos—worse than that imaginary chaos that theologians tell us would result if divine agency were withdrawn from the Universe. If a being without order, harmony and adaptation, or a divine chaos, can create an orderly universe then there is no consistency in saying that unintelligent matter could not have produced the objects that we behold. If order, harmony and adaptation do exist in the Divine mind (or in the substance which produces thought, power and purpose in the Divine mind) they must be eternal, for that which constitutes the essential nature of a God, must be the eternal basis of his being. If the order, harmony and adaptation in God are co-existent with him, are eternal, they must be independent of design, for that which never began to exist could not have been produced, and does not therefore admit of design. If order, harmony and adaptation are independent of design in the divine mind, it is certain that order, harmony and adaptation exist, that are no evidence of a pre-existent, designing intelligence.

If order, harmony and adaptation exist, which were not produced by design, which are therefore no evidence of design, it is unreasonable and illogical to infer designing intelligence from the fact alone that order, harmony and adaptation exist in Nature. Therefore an intelligent Deity cannot be inferred from the order, harmony and adaptation in Deity to produce his thoughts, and to execute his plans, are eternal, why not the formation of matter into worlds, and the evolutions of the various forms of vegetable and animal life on this globe be the result of the ceaseless action of self-existent matter in accordance with an inherent eternal principle of adaptation? Is it more reasonable to suppose the Universe was created, or constructed by a being in whom exists the most wonderful order and harmony, and the most admirable adaptation to construct a Universe (which order, harmony and adaptation could have had no designing cause), than to suppose that the Universe itself in its entirety is eternal, and the self-producing cause of all the manifestations we behold?

Is a God uncaused, and who made everything from nothing, more easy of belief than a Universe uncaused and existing according to its own inherent nature. Is it wonderful that matter should be self-existent; that it should possess the power to form suns, planets, and construct that beautiful ladder of life that reaches from the lowest forms of the vegetable kingdom up to man? How much more wonderful that a great being should exist, without any cause, who had no beginning, and who is infinitely more admirable than the Universe itself.

Again, the plan of a work is as much evidence of intelligence and design, as the work which embodies the plan. The plan of a steam engine in the mind of Fitch, the plan of the locomotive in the mind of Stephenson was as much evidence of design as the piece of machinery after its mechanical construction. If God be an omniscient being—a being who knows everything; to whose knowledge no addition can be made—his plans must be eternal—without beginning, and therefore uncaused. If God's plans are not eternal; if from time to time new plans originate in his mind, there must be an addition to his knowledge, and if his knowledge admits of addition, it must be finite. But if his plans had no beginning; if, like himself, they are eternal, they must, like him, be independent of design. Now, the plan of a thing, we have already seen, is as much evidence of design as the object which embodies the plan. Since the plans of deity are no proof of design that produced them, (for they are supposed to be eternal), the plan of this Universe, of course, was no evidence of a designing intelligence that produced it. But since the plan of the Universe is as much evidence of design as the Universe itself, and since the former is no evidence of design, it follows that design cannot be inferred from the existence of the Universe.

The absurdity of the a posteriori argument for a God consists in the assumption that what we call order and adaptation in nature are evidence of design, when it is evident that whether there be a God or not, order and adaptation must have existed from eternity, and are not therefore necessarily proof of a designing cause. The reasoning of the theologian is like that of the Hindu in accounting for the position of the earth. "Whatever exists must have some support," said he. The earth exists, and is therefore supported. He imagined it resting on the back of an elephant. The elephant needing some support, he supposed rested on the back of a huge tortoise. He forgot that according to his own premise, that whatever exists must have some support, required that the tortoise should rest on something. The inconclusiveness of his reasoning is apparent to a child. Whatever exists is supported. The earth exists. Therefore, the earth is supported; it rests on an elephant; the elephant rests on a tortoise; the tortoise exists, but nothing is said about its support.

The theologian says order, harmony and adaptation are evidence of a designing intelligence that produced them. The earth and its productions show order, harmony and adaptation. Therefore, the earth and its productions have been produced by an intelligent designer. Just as the Hindu stopped reasoning when he imagined the earth on an elephant, and the elephant on a tortoise, so the theologian stops reasoning when he says, God made the world. But as surely as from the premise that whatever exists must have some support, follows the conclusion that the tortoise rests on something, as it rests on the elephant, does it follow from the proposition that order, harmony and adaptation are proof of an intelligent designer, that the order, harmony and adaptation in the Deity to produce the effects ascribed to him are evidence of an intelligent designer who made him, as the various parts of Nature, adapted to one another, are evidence of an intelligent designer that produced them. This reasoning leads to the conclusion that there has been an infinite succession of creative and created Gods, which is inconsistent with the idea of a First Cause, the creator of the Universe. Then why attempt to explain the mysteries of the Universe by imagining a God who produced everything but himself, and why argue from the order and fitness in the world the existence of a designer. It reminds me of the ostrich, that having buried its head in the sand, so as to render invisible its pursuers fancies there is no further need of exertion to escape from the dangers and difficulties which surround it.

"Design represented as a search after final cause, until we come to a first cause, and then stop," says F. N. Newman, "is an argument I confess which in itself brings me no satisfaction." "The attempt," says Buckle, "which Paley and others have made to solve this mystery by rising from the laws to the cause, are evidently futile, because to the eye of reason the solution is as incomprehensible as the problem, and the arguments of the natural theologian, in so far as they are arguments, must depend on reason."

Design implies the use of means for the attainment of ends. Man designs, plans, contrives and uses secondary agencies to accomplish his purposes, because unable to attain his ends directly. But how absurd to speak of contrivance and design in a being of infinite power and knowledge. Man, to build a steamship has to fell trees, and hew them into various shapes, get iron from the earth, and smelt it in furnaces, and work it into bolts, braces, nails, etc., hundreds of workmen, carpenters, joiners, blacksmiths, cabinet-makers, painters, caulkers, riggers, etc., labor for months before the vessel can be launched. If man possessed the power to speak into existence a steamship, would he contrive, plan and use means to construct it? On the contrary, would it not come instantly into existence as a complete, perfect whole?

But the existence of a steamer, since it is only a means to an end, would be inconsistent with unlimited power in man. If he were able to effect his purposes why should he construct a vessel with which to visit far off lands? Infinite power would enable him to cross the ocean by the mere exercise of his will. It is evident at a glance that the use of means is incompatible with infinite knowledge and infinite power. This argument of my friend in proving too much proves nothing, and demonstrates its own worthlessness, and therefore we cast it aside. Design implies finiteness; man designs and has to calculate and use means to accomplish his end. If he were all powerful would he use that power to construct ships to cross the ocean, or armies to win battles, when he could accomplish his end without, and by those means demonstrate that he is infinite in power? An infinite being would not have to employ means to complete his works; he would not have to doubt and cogitate before he accomplished his design; that would be the method of man. It is absurd to suppose that a God did all those things. He supposed God infinite in everything, in his power, in his love and kindness. He has power to do everything. And yet the world is so constructed that at every step we take we crush to death creatures, as minutely and curiously formed as ourselves. They kill one another in numerous struggles and life has been such a series of bloody battles, resulting in destruction of life, that the Water-loos and Solferinos of history are nothing in comparison. Where is the design in the volcano that belches forth its fiery billows and buries in ruins a Pompeii and a Herculaneum? Where is the design in the tornado that sends a fleet with its precious freight of humanity beneath the remorseless waves? Where is the design in the suffering and torture that thousands feel this very moment in the chambers of sickness, and in the hospitals full of diseases? Where is the evidence of a great Being who has the power to make men happy, and yet allows the world to go on in all its misery—such misery as it makes one's heart ache to see, and which we, imperfect creatures as we are, would gladly stop if we could?

And where is the design in the thousands of facts which science has brought to light, showing that there are organs and parts that serve no purpose at all, but on the contrary, are injurious to their possessors? Why do some animals, like the dugong, have tusks that never cut through the gums? Why has the guinea pig teeth that are shed before it is born? Science tells us these rudimentary structures are the remnants of a former state, in which these parts were of service; but theology which requires us to believe that a God made all these animals as we now see them, cannot possibly reconcile these facts with infinite wisdom and goodness.

Adaptation in organisms instead of having been produced by a Deity, we hold is largely the result of natural selection. Adaptation must exist as the adjustment of objects to their environments. If a flock of sheep be exposed to the weather of a severe climate, those of them having the thinnest wool affording the least protection from the cold, will perish. Those with the thickest wool and hardest nature will survive every year, and by the law of heredity, transmit their favorable variations. By this process those best adapted to the climate live, and the others perish. Thus in the struggle for life we have the "survival of the fittest," without any design whatever. But the theologian comes along and looking at the sheep, says: "See how God has adapted these sheep to the climate." He forgets the thousands that have shivered and perished in winter's cold as the condition of this adaptation. So animals change the color of their coverings in accordance with their environments. The bears among the icebergs of the North are white, because in the struggle for life every light variation has been favorable to the animal—has facilitated its escape from the hunter and its preying upon the living things on which it subsists. Those with darker coverings have gradually become extinct, leaving in undisputed possession of the snow banks and icebergs this species, which in color resemble the general aspect of its surroundings. Look at the rabbits. Some change their color every year; some are brown in the summer and white like the snow in winter. Those with this tendency to change their color during the year, having the most favorable variation, have persisted, and this tendency, by heredity, has been accumulated, until it has become a part of the nature of the animal. These are but illustrations of a principle discovered by Darwin and Wallace, and which explains largely how, not only color and thickness of coverings, but how speed, strength and suppleness of body, keenness of sight and hearing, and all other parts and powers of organism have been developed in adaptation to their environment, without any special design whatever.

My friend says, we have no evidence of the eternal existence of the Universe, because we have no personal observation of it. But has he any personal observation to prove the existence of an eternal God? Yet he believes in it. We believe the Universe always has existed in the past, because we see no trace of a beginning; we believe it always will exist in the future, because we see no prospect or possibility of an end. Worlds have their formation and dissolution, but the substance is neither augmented nor diminished. Matter is indestructible and eternal. We are not therefore in need of a creator.

My opponent says, I declared space was matter. But I did not. I simply said, in giving an illustration, that we can measure space; that if it were nothing, if it had no existence, it would not admit of measurement; but since our knowledge of the eternal world is by comparison, of objects, or since our explanations consist in showing what a thing is by designating qualities which it has in common with other things we have seen or known, it is impossible to define or classify space, for the reason that we know of nothing which it resembles. My friend says we cannot measure space, but we can. Is not the science of trigonometry founded on the measurement of space? I admit, of course, that we cannot measure the infinity of space, but we can measure so much as may be included between two points.

Voltaire is quoted to prove the being of a God, but Voltaire was a Theist like my opponent, and his statement counts for nothing as affecting me, even if in history, I accept him as an authority. But, exclaims my friend, look at the stars, and the sun and the moon and the beautiful planets! Yes, look at them, but how are you going to prove by looking at them, the existence of a creator? Science has demonstrated that worlds are evolved by a process just as independent of a creator as is the formation of rain by the condensation of vapor in the atmosphere. I am told further by this representative of theology, that life, vegetable, animal and intellectual, is a general outline of a God.

He tells you truly that Huxley has added materially to our knowledge of biology. I am glad to hear a good word from a theologian of this Province for Prof. Huxley. But our friend forgot to point out how life is a proof of a God. He appeals to the Bible and says he will defend the teachings of that book from the assaults made in the name of science. But he should familiarize himself with the teachings of science, compare them with the Bible, accept the true, and cast aside the false, however consecrated by the faith and piety of ages. A mere appeal to the Bible, in matters of science, proves nothing.

We are told that Tyndall is not an Atheist. Well, in what sense? In his reply to his critics, Tyndall courageously says: "I do not fear the charge of Atheism, nor should I ever disavow it, in reference to any definition of the Supreme, which he or his order would be likely to frame."

Tyndall is not an Atheist according to the narrow definition of my opponent, but certainly is in the sense of recognizing no personal intelligent Being that created and governs the Universe. Quoting from somebody, my friend brings the authority of Tyndall to the purport that, to the forces in the egg must be added another form of force, called heat, before the chicken is developed. But why take the trouble to quote that? We all know that there are certain forces in the egg, which by the application of heat, are by the law of correlation converted into life, intelligence and consciousness. This admits not of a doubt. But how does it prove a God or a Designer? Life exists so homogeneously that there is not sufficient differentiation for us to discover any difference in the parts of the living substance which is but a mass of jelly or a speck of albumen. There is nothing in its origin more wonderful than in the phenomena of crystallization. And from these low homogeneous forms of life, by causes entirely natural we believe, have been in the course of ages, developed higher, more specialized and more complex organisms. We hold with Tyndall that "as far as the eye of science has hitherto ranged through Nature, no intrusion of purely creative power into any series of phenomena, has ever been observed."

The assumption of such a power to account for special phenomena has always proved a failure. It is opposed to the very spirit of science, and I therefore assumed the responsibility of holding up in contrast with it, that method of nature which it has been the vocation and triumph of science to disclose, and in the application of which we can alone hope for further light. Holding, then, that the nebular and all subsequent life stand to each other in the relation of the germ to the finished organism, I re-affirm here, not arrogantly or defiantly, but without a shade of indistinctness, the position laid down in Belfast."

The Threatened Danger.

In taking thought for the morrow and surveying the horizon of our Republic, it must be confessed the outlook is neither pleasant, promising, nor encouraging.

"Caution is speed when danger's to be passed," and it behooves the people of our country to build carefully upon solid ground, and see to it that the fabric of our institutions is of the best material to stand the wear and tear of time's recurrent changes.

Aside from thieving politicians, political rings, stuffed ballot boxes and a demoralized party press, there looms up before our vision a threatened disaster of such magnitude that we may well stand appalled at the contemplation of what may be.

Upon one hand is a silly Protestant people combining to insinuate their God into our Constitution, thus aiming at the very heart of our liberties, while upon the other hand, a wily and designing Catholic priesthood strikes at our public schools, the bulwark of our independence, in order to shatter the mind of the nation.

When we think of the bold designs of the Protestant religion and the shameful insult of a foolish old man, three thousand miles away, dressed in the trappings and upholstery of a Pope, presuming to dictate the conduct of the citizens of a free country, we may well pause and ask, What are we coming to? To what end are we hastening?

Americans! Liberals! Citizens of the grandest government under the sun, the appeal is to you, guard well the basis of our freedom, be watchful of your interests and the interests of coming generations, who will bless you for your firmness and independence, or curse you for your negligence.

A hydra-headed monster is approaching, is even now in our midst; but a little while and all your energies will be required to beat back the viper that would sting our glorious privileges to death, and poison forever the fountain of our liberties. Let no sweet flattery or hope soothe you to present rest and repose, for now is the time for action and effort.

The times demand that every loyal, truth-loving soul should be awake and in earnest, remembering that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Hymn on Modern Philanthropists.

BY LEWIS MASQUERIER.

[TUNE—"Auld Lang Syne,"]

Philanthropists should be revered,
Who boldly dared to tell
Those truths which priests and tyrants feared,
And always strove to quell.
Recall to memory those men
Who early struck a blow;
Who either fought with sword or pen
Against a pious foe.

CHORUS—Let sentiments of gratitude,
With pleasure swell each breast,
For those who nobly Truth pursued,
And unborn millions blessed.

Those men can never be forgot,
Whose works are widely read;
Who govern by the force of thought
Long after they are dead.
Brave D'Holbach, Volney, Hume and Paine,
Like true Redeemers save;
Have ably striven to unchain,
And free the mental slave.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

Kind Robert Owen loved mankind;
He found all earth amiss;
That millions pauperized and blind,
Had reached no earthly bliss.
Forget not noble Frances Wright,
An honor to her age,
Who more than hell the priests affright,
And fill with holy rage.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

To honest Abner Kneeland, give
All praise, who dared to scan
All creeds, and deemed it fraud to live
By that which curses man.
Charles Knowlton bless, who showed that mind
Is motion of the brain;
Searched for a spirit world to find—
A human soul in vain.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

Bless brave Ben Offen—Nature schooled—
Who tore the thin disguise
From pious quacks, and ridiculed
The old Jew-book of lies.
Bless Gilbert Vale—Paine's advocate
Against all priestly lies—
Who fought the wrongs of Church and State;
Scanned planets, suns and skies.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

George Henry Evans bless, who found
For hireling tenant's toil,
The thorough cure is in the ground,
A life share in the soil.
That earth gives self-employment,
The power to procure
Food, clothing, shelter and content;
Rids earth of rich and poor.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

Let homesteads not be alienate,
Or mortgaged, willed or sold,
But swapped, that some may emigrate.
Yet homes forever hold.
Thus equal wants create a right,
And give all equal shares
Of homestead, water, air and light,
Thus easing all life's cares.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

Man, too, must reach self-government,
In towns throughout a state;
In proper person vote consent,
By townships legislate.
Forget not, then, such pioneers
In Science, Truth and Arts,
Who at the priesthood's lies and jeers,
Sought to amend their hearts.

CHORUS—Let sentiments, etc.

Gov. SMITH of Georgia says the worst scoundrels in the country, and the men who keep the negroes in a turmoil, are the negro preachers, or at least a large majority of them, who, under the cloak of religion, instill into the minds of the colored men notions of law, politics, civil rights, insurrection, and a host of other things which only make them loafers and thieves. He wants authority to arrest for vagrancy all such disturbers.

"Temple of Reason."

By all means let us have it. Let us have a temple dedicated to the chief counselor of all our faculties, the chief educator of our intellect; not simply a monument of architectural beauty or a sanctuary of devotion bearing the monogram of Reason, but a real utilitarian edifice of a magnitude commensurate with the importance of the propagandism of truth.

It should contain a hall with acoustic design sufficient for 20,000 people to hear Robt. G. Ingersoll's oration on the Gods, and many similar didactic orations, which science and education are preparing the minds of the people to receive. Be assured such an oratorium will not be erected till it is needed, and when it is built, such words of truth and science will scorch like a terrible simoon the principles of superstition and priestcraft, and will call forth an audience proportionably larger, as science and wisdom are more attractive than the superstitious ritualism of priestcraft. The rehearsal of words of wisdom is interesting and captivating; the sermon of an ecclesiastic produces ennui.

The "Temple of Reason" should contain the best library and reading room of Free thought in the world. It should contain a publishing house where Free thought volumes and journals would welcome advanced ideas as messengers of truth. It should be a kind of home for the moral philosopher and philanthropist—a kind of Alma Mater that will assist in the development of such moralists as Confucius, Aristotle and Thomas Paine.

No unutilitarian monument or mere sanctuary would be productive of good to our cause. Our great principles of truth forbid that we should spend time, precious time, in idolizing a principle or in any ritualistic ceremony. Conscious justice bids us employ all our time in forwarding the knowledge of the truth as it is manifested by a perpetual revelation of Nature. God or Nature, the embodiment of truth and law makes a perpetual revelation to man, and the educators of our race should as continually receive and assist in transmitting the truth. The highest types of mankind will be produced where there is a free and untrammelled use of reason. J. R. PARKS.

Dry Goods Price-List.

Thousands in the country are constantly debating the question of prices in dry goods. They go to the most popular store in the neighborhood, and fail there to learn for a certainty whether fair prices are charged or not. Other thousands are not only seeking honest and fair prices, but they want also reliable information in regard to the styles of goods most in demand. Now, all such persons should send a letter to the highly respectable and reliable firm of M. Altman & Co., and ask for their new Price-list. This enterprising and well-known dry goods firm have taken this method of popularizing their business in every section of country. This Price-list, containing thirty-two pages of closely printed matter, gives a minute description of a $250,000 stock of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Millinery Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Furnishing Goods, Ladies' and Children's Under-garments, Costumes, Cloaks, Basques, Hosiery, Gloves, Jewelry, Laces, Trimmings, Parasols, Umbrellas, Notions and the thousand and one articles usually sold in first-class city houses. It will be sent, free of cost, to any one sending address and postage stamp for mailing the same.

We have examined this Price-list, and find that it teaches its readers how to order goods. The description it gives of every article is so perfect and complete as to make the selection extremely easy and certain of giving satisfaction. This firm will give their best attention to the execution of all orders, and they agree to refund the money in every case where the goods turn out different from their representations. The standing of the house is such that we cheerfully vouch for the truth of whatever they say: Address M. ALTMAN & Co., corner 6th avenue and 19th street, New York.—EDITOR INDEPENDENT.

[We know and have known Mr. Altman and his manner of doing business for some time, and are fully enabled to endorse the views of our contemporary, and although we seldom agree in matters theological, we are pleased to accord our hearty concurrence with its judgment in reference to our friend MORRIS ALTMAN. He is just getting out his new Fall and Winter Price-list, containing accurate descriptions and the lowest price of House-furnishing Goods, such as Sheetings, Towels, Blankets, Quilts, etc., as well as his full assortment of Ladies' Suits, made up in the latest styles in Alpaca, Poplins, Reps, Merinos, Cashmere Silks, Camel's Hair Goods, etc., etc., as low as $10 each, and as high as $300.

This Price-list is sent free to all our readers who may send a stamp and their address, and to those hesitating, or who may be unable to send stamp, he will furnish the Price-list free upon their sending in their address. Mr. Altman is also anxious that Liberals who may send for his Price-list should distribute them freely in their towns and villages.—Ed. T. S.]

We hope those who ought to be friends to THE TRUTH SEEKER are not going to let it die of absolute starvation. The world needs such a paper, and we know it is doing good, but it cannot live without material aid. If every friend will pay up promptly for himself, and send in as many new names as possible, there will be no trouble. We will continue at our post as long as life and strength endures, and we will do our best to spread truth over the land if you will sustain us and forget not our needs.

But to THE TRUTH SEEKER LEAFLETS; here are some of them. Let those who want these and others at the low figures named, please send us an order.

Is the Bible the Word of God?

Our Christian friends declare to us the Bible is certainly the word of God, and that it has been preserved by his watchful care for thousands of years. Is this so? If it is the work of a perfect being it must be a perfect production, and contain no faults nor errors. God would surely not write, nor send forth a book filled with absurdities and mistakes. If it is defective, if it is false, if it is contradictory it can not be God's work, it must be man's. Upon careful examination it is found many statements are made in it which can not be true. Hundreds of positive contradictions can be pointed out. Much that is low and obscene is scattered all through it. Much of it is unfit to be read by a modest lady or in her presence.

The best commentators admit that many passages and even whole chapters have been added to it; and the first Christian authorities say that many books in the Bible are spurious, without proof of divine origin, and unworthy a place in the sacred collection. King James' version, first published in 1611, was one hundred years after corrected by Bishops Zenison and Lloyd, and thousands of errors were found. More recently the British Bible Society have declared that a "faithful examination of it gives serious doubt whether it truthfully can be called the Word of God." We are told by the strongest advocates for a revision of the Holy Scriptures that there are 150,000 errors in our version, or twenty-seven to each chapter; and though millions of copies of it have been industriously circulated, they think these should all be laid aside, and a greatly improved "Word of God" given in their place. A body of Bible-revisers have for years been at work at it in England, trying to make the book a fit one for the people of the present age to read, and it is asserted that they are leaving scarcely a passage unchanged. Can it be possible sensible people will longer believe that a book, made up of detached fragments written by unknown persons, that is found so full of imperfections and errors, could have been written and preserved by God? Is not a base falsehood uttered whenever this is asserted to be the case? Will the book be any more worthy the confidence of thinking people after this body of modern "doctors of divinity" have remodelled it, than when in fragments it left the hands of ancient priests? Will such doctoring materially improve it or make that the word of God which before was not?

Really has not this idol by a confiding people been believed and worshiped long enough? Is the world always to be content with shams and falsehood? Is it not about time we reject the book with 150,000 errors and turn our attention to that great Volume of the Universe, which is not false, which is not susceptible of alteration, which is ever true and reliable, and will not lead us into error? Let us turn from this false book, written and defended by ignorant, superstitious, and designing priests, a mere relic of the barbarous past, and let us study the immense volume of truth ever open before us, which needs no revising, no doctoring, and which is equally free and easily understood by all tongues, nations and peoples.

Christianity Briefly Considered.

Christianity is now the established religion; he who attempts to impugn it, must be contented to behold murderers and traitors take precedence of him in public opinion; though, if his genius be equal to his courage, and assisted by a peculiar coalition of circumstances, future ages may exalt him to a divinity, and persecute others in his name, as he was persecuted in the name of his predecessors in the homage of the world. The same means that have supported every other popular belief, have supported Christianity. War, imprisonment, assassination, and falsehood; deeds of unexampled and incomparable atrocity have made it what it is. The blood shed by the votaries of the God of mercy and peace, since the establishment of his religion, would probably suffice to drown all other sectaries now on the habitable globe. We derive from our ancestors a faith thus fostered and supported; we quarrel, persecute, and hate for its maintenance. Analogy seems to favor the opinion, that as, like other systems, Christianity has arisen and augmented, so like them it will decay and perish; that as violence, darkness, and deceit, not reasoning and persuasion, have procured its admission among mankind, so, when enthusiasm has subsided, and time, that infallible controverter of false opinions, has involved its pretended evidences in the darkness of antiquity, it will become obsolete; that Milton's poem alone will give permanency to the remembrance of its absurdities; and that men will laugh heartily at grace, faith, redemption, and original sin, as they now do at the metamorphoses of Jupiter, the miracle of Romish saints, and the existence of witchcraft. Either the Christian religion is true, or it is false; if true, it comes from God, and its authenticity can admit of doubt and dispute no further than its omnipotent author is willing to allow. Either the power or the goodness of God is called in question, if he leaves those doctrines most essential to the well-being of man in doubt and dispute; the only ones which, since their promulgation, have been the subject of unceasing cavil, the cause of irreconcilable hatred. If God has spoken, why is the universe not convinced?

Christianity was intended to reform the world; had an all wise Being planned it, nothing is more improbable than that it should have failed; omniscience would infallibly have foreseen the inutility of such a scheme which experience demonstrates, to this age, to have been utterly unsuccessful.

The Christian's Belief.

That God after spending in idleness millions of ages, 6000 years ago made the earth, the sun, and moon, the stars and worlds in six days, and all from nothing. That there were several days, mornings and evenings before the sun was made, and that all vegetation, trees, shrubs, and plants brought forth seeds and fruits before there was any sun; that he made man of dust and woman of a rib-bone weighing a few ounces. That he placed a tempting fruit before the pair when he well knew they would taste it, and thereby damn their souls and thousands of millions of their helpless offspring to the eternal torments of hell. That he made the devil, with the knowledge that he would ever lead his creatures astray and down to the regions of the damned. That God got sorry for what he had done in making man, and, to get rid of him, he sent an immense flood, and covered the earth five miles deep all over its surface and drowned every man, woman, and child, every animal, bird and insect, every tree, and every plant, except the cargo of one boat. That God dried up all this water and took it out of existence. That he gained nothing by all this trouble, the world being just as wicked after as before. That God again became greatly incensed with the human race, and to appease his anger he devised this beautiful scheme by which a few of the children of Adam might escape the effects of his endless wrath. That he held intercourse with a young Jew girl, and begot a dearly beloved son and sent him into the world, where he worked several years at the carpenters' trade, then traveled around the country and preached, when he was put to an ignominious death to satisfy the relentless justice of his father, by which divine process one in a hundred of this race may escape the burning lake of eternal fire, kindly prepared for all the rest.

Thirty-Six Questions.

1. Would endless punishment be for the good of any human being?
2. If God loves his enemies will he punish them any more than is for their good?
3. If God loves his friends, if he loves his enemies also, are not all mankind objects of his love?
4. If God loves only those who love him, what better is he than a sinner?
5. As "love thinketh no evil," can God design the ultimate evil of a single soul?
6. If man does wrong in returning evil for evil, would not God do wrong in doing the same thing?
7. Would not endless punishment be a return of evil for evil?
8. If God hates the sinner, would it not be natural for the sinner to hate him?
9. If God loves his enemies now, will he not always do the same?
10. Would it be unjust in God to be kind to all men in a future state?
11. If all men deserve endless punishment, will not those who are saved miss divine justice?
12. Does divine justice require the infliction of pain from which mercy recoils?
13. If God would save all men but cannot, is he infinite in his power?
14. If God can save all men and will not, is he infinite in his goodness?
15. Did God desire universal salvation when he created men?
16. Will God carry his original designs into execution?
17. Can God will anything contrary to his knowledge?
18. Did God know when he created man that a large portion of his creatures would be endlessly wretched?
19. If he did not know all at the creation, is he infinite in knowledge?
20. If God made an endless hell, did he do so for the express purpose of burning men in it?

21. If an angel became a devil by sinning, was Adam's the original sin?

22. Would there be any more impropriety in imputing my sin to Adam than his to me?

23. If men are totally depraved, must not children be so also?

24. If children are totally depraved, how is it true that "of such is the kingdom of heaven?"

25. Is it the revealed will of God that all men should be saved?

26. Could God will that all men should be saved, when he knew that many would be lost?

27. If belief and good works are essential to salvation, how can infants be saved?

28. Can he truly love God who worships him through a fear of the devil?

29. Can the love of God be changed to hatred?

30. Can the Deity be universally good, if endless punishment is meted out to a single soul?

31. Can a good man love and worship a being who has created millions for endless torture?

32. Are those not the enemies of God who charge such conduct upon him?

33. Can it be a virtue to charge a good being with the most abominable characteristics?

34. If God made all things and knew all things; if he made the Devil, knowing he would lead mankind astray, will it be just to punish mankind for it?

35. Would not a being who would do this, be as bad or worse, than the Devil?

36. If the Devil is the author of endless hell-fire, would it not be the noblest thing God could do to put it out?

The Bible and Liberty.

Frederick Maurice warned people of the danger they ran when they "turned the bread of life into stones to cast at their enemies." Now, passing by the fact that many of us do not consider the Bible as the bread of life in any sense, I would suggest that using it as a pebble to sling at the forehead of Liberty has not, in the past, tended to exalt it, nor is it likely to be more successful in the future. Long ago, a king sat on a beach to warn back the advancing tide. Wave after wave broke into laughter on the strand, and the water rose higher and higher, till it washed the kingly feet, and began to surround the kingly chair. The sea knew no master. And so for centuries has religion stood, with the Bible in her lifted hand; she has warned back each wave of the rising tide of liberty, and each wave has rippled forward regardless of her threats. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," said the Bible to Cromwell, and Cromwell, though he took off his hat to the Bible, struck down the tyrant who strove to enchain the people. "Honor the king," said the Bible to Washington, and Washington defied the king, and founded the American Republic. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," said the Bible, and stern law saved the feeble from the Bible-sharpened sword. If a city is withdrawn to serve strange gods, "thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly," said the Bible to Alva, and Alva obediently harried the Netherlands, and the people rose, and fought for their lives and won. "Cursed is Canaan: a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren," said the Bible from ten thousand pulpits; but men arose and swore that, Bible or no Bible, the slave should go free. The Bible! why it has bolstered up every injustice—it has bulwarked every tyranny—it has defended every wrong. With toil and pain and bloodshed have the soldiers of Liberty wrung from the reluctant hands of priests and Bible-worshippers every charter of our freedom, every triumph of our cause. Every step in science has been won in despite of the Bible; every inch of natural knowledge has been conquered at the sword's point from the realm of the supernatural. From the stake where Bruno stood and died, from the dungeon where Galileo knelt and trembled, a voice has rung out that every advance of science has been struggled against by the Bible and the Church. But take heart, you who cling to your Bibles; as soon as we have gained this one step forward—as soon as it rings through the land that women are no longer in subjection, you will be able to claim as the offspring of your Christianity that which, at its birth, you anathematized. Each trophy of advancement, each symbol of triumph, is claimed by the Bibliolator as his as soon as it becomes popular. You will be able to find in your Bibles a sanction for the free development of womanhood, even as you have found room in the six days of Genesis for the vast æons of geology, and space in the petty firmament of Moses for the mighty facts of astronomy. The Bible is claimed as the true parent of modern freedom, as the striker-off of the chains of the slave, the guardian of the feeble from the tyranny of the strong. It is the spirit of Christianity has done it all, you say, when the letter said "kill," it meant "preserve;" when the letter said "enslave," it meant "set free." So take courage, ye worshipers of a book; your idol will be shattered once more, but it can once more be re-mended; it will fall once more before the trumpet-blast of freedom; but once more it can be raised. We mean to set woman free; free to follow the guiding hand of Nature, free to fulfill every fair capability of her being; free to develop every noble intellectual power, and every passionate longing of her heart; free to expand in every direction; free to grow, to strengthen and to rise. Little care we whether or not our work square with the rules of an old Eastern civilization; let those who are anxious about it see to that. Our work need not in itself trench on religion; but if religion and the Bible grapple with us, and try to stop and destroy us, then religion and the Bible must either stand aside, or else they must go down.

Christian Frauds.

Christianity is imperious in its assumptions. It claims to be all that is truthful, noble and magnanimous; it boasts of its humanity and its moral and civilizing influence; but what a burlesque upon its pretensions is its actual history, sectarian enmity, grass intolerance, and bloody and inhuman persecutions? Can Christianity with its arrogance and cupidity, show a purer record than that exhibited by ancient paganism? Christian nations are pre-eminent for their love of war, plunder and devastation; and so great is their mutual distrust, that even during the uncertain periods when there is no actual war, the armed peace of Europe costs $1,500,000,000 annually. Can Christian people claim to be more upright, more honorable and more exemplary than Buddhists, Mohammedans, or Parsees? In numerous instances the ethics of China or Japan, might bring the blush to ancient Christendom. What among the deceptive transactions of Bible-worshippers, who boast of a purer theology, is still most common? Frauds in castle and court, in State affairs, and in Church matters; frauds in national intrigue, in diplomacy, and in naval and military affairs; frauds in Senate Chambers, in law tribunals, in elections and in appointments; frauds by word and by oath; in buying and selling, in giving and receiving; frauds by weight and frauds by measure; frauds by adulteration and frauds in every imaginable shape and form that may escape the penalty of crime."

"The priests, with all their spiritual endowments and all their boasted superiority, have proved themselves but frail and fallible men, and though there are many excellent persons among them, yet as a class, in proportion to their numbers, they surpass all others in sensuality, and so notorious have they become in this respect, that one can scarcely take up a newspaper that does not bear record of their villainess. Though a large majority of the cases of their sexual criminality are covered up for the credit of Christianity, enough comes to the light to effectually damn the perpetrators and their institution in the eyes of all right-minded people.

Yes, the despised heathens are more honest and upright than the first Christian nations, and the ordinary farmer, mechanic and laborer is more moral and pure-minded than the average priest or preacher. Why should sensible people continue to revere a privileged class of men whose conduct is often beneath an honest man's contempt?

Godly Guardianship.

If there be a God, he evidently does not interfere in the affairs of this world. Pestilences may strew the earth with corpses of the loved; the survivors may bend above them in agony—children may expire vainly asking for bread; while God sits smiling in the sky. The innocent may languish unto death in the obscurity of dungeons; brave men and heroic women may be changed to ashes at the bigot's stake, while the smiling Deity sits above the clouds, unacquainted with the miseries of men.

Empires may be overthrown; dynasties may be extinguished in blood; millions of slaves may toil beneath the fierce rays of the sun, and the cruel strokes of the lash, yet God serenely sits in heaven. Out on the wide sea, in darkness and storm, the shipwrecked struggle with the cruel waves, and where is the God who is an ever present help in time of need? The streets of the world are filled with the diseased, the deformed, and the helpless; the chambers of pain are crowded with the pale forms of the suffering, while God idly sits on his great white throne, listening to the golden harps of the angelic choirs. Cities are drowned by rushing lava; the earth opens and thousands perish; women raise their clasped hands towards heaven, but the Gods are too happy and indifferent to aid their suffering children.

If there be a God, that God must be the creator of all evil; and such a proposition is more revolting than the worst forms of Atheism. I had rather credit any absurdity, or commit any conceivable folly, than acknowledge a creed like that. Can we suppose that a God of infinite reason and unlimited power would voluntarily create such a universe as this? Would he give life to beings, only to confer an acquaintance with its exquisite sweetness, and then almost instantly take it away? Would he plant in quivering hearts not only these burning tortures which are the very essence of hate, but those sorrowing stings that follow the rosy feet of gliding love also? Tell me that God made some other world, where perfection is the order of Nature, and I may, perhaps, believe you. But ask me not to admit a divine origin for such a desolate sphere as this. Somewhere else, for aught I know or care, there may be harmony. Here I behold nothing but sin and discord. Pestilence and famine—volcanoes and devouring war—tempest and earthquake, alone reign around us. A wild, wailing howl of agony resounds through all lands; and even brute instinct echoes the appalling cry of the human. Vanity is written in fire-letters of ruin, even on yon starry azure, where pale suns burst in shivered bubbles, and vanish away. Urge not that Deity dug, in void space, this universal sepulcher, haunted alone by the ghosts of mourners, by the incalculable millions. Say that it is the work of some dreadful demon, and I may entertain the proposition.

Spirit of Nature! all sufficing power.
Necessity! thou mother of the world!
All that the Universe contains
Are but thy passive instruments, and thou
Regardest them with an impartial eye,
Whose joy and pain thou cannot feel.
The interminable spirit it contains Is nature only God; but human pride
Is skillful to invent most serious names
To hide its ignorance.

Christian Confessions.

Rev. John Dick, D.D., is conceded to have been the ablest advocate Christianity ever had. Consider the following admissions extracted from his Theology (vol. 1, page 122). "We do not possess the original copies of the sacred writings. The autographs of the apostles and prophets have long since disappeared. The copy of the law, which was written by the hand of Moses himself, seems to have been preserved for many ages, and it was that copy which was found by Hilkiah, the high priest, and read in the ears of Josiah; but it perished, we may presume, in the destruction of the temple. Modern times can boast only of transcripts, removed from the originals, by more or fewer steps, according to the age in which they were written. The oldest of the Mss., can not be referred farther back than the fifth, or perhaps the fourth century, and is posterior to the last book of the New Testament by at least three hundred years."

"It may be presumed that the persons employed in transcribing the sacred writings would be at great pains to make the copies accurate; yet, without a miracle, every transcript could not have been a faultless representation of the original; and that no supernatural influence was exerted upon their minds, may be confidently inferred from the different readings which appear upon a collection of Mss. It is certain that they can not all be right, and it is probable that not one of them is correct." (page 124). "No single Mss. can be supposed to exhibit the original text, without the slightest variation; and it is to be presumed that in all Mss. errors more or fewer in number are to be found."

Transcribers made alterations in their copies, in order to correct some word which appeared to them faulty, or which they did not understand; they omitted words which they reckoned superfluous, or added words to illustrate what they judged defective or improper. Various readings have also been produced, by transferring to the text glosses or notes which had been written on the margin. Some have been attributed to wilful corruption, with a view to serve the purposes of a party. This crime has been charged upon the Jews, upon heretics, and even upon those who were called orthodox."

"It is evidently ignorance and prejudice which would lead any person to consider the received text as so sacred that no alteration ought to be made in it. Its history shows that its claim is disputable, and that it may be superseded by a text more carefully compiled." (127).

"Ancient versions of the Scriptures are also another source of various readings. But here, I think, greater caution is necessary. For in the first place, we are not certain that those versions have come down to us in an uncorrupted state, or rather, we are certain that they have suffered as much as the Mss. of the Scriptures by transcriptions, so that we cannot be sure, in many cases, that where they differ now from the originals they differed at first. If a person were to read a variety of modern translations, and not to know that they were all made from the same text, I have no doubt that he would in some cases conclude that they had been formed upon different texts." (page 125).

Questions.

1. Who will give a really truthful description of the God, the Devil, a heaven, a hell, an angel, a ghost, a spirit, a soul, or what conditions man takes on after death as an individual existence, that words can make understandable?
 2. If the above is unanswerable for the want of observation and knowledge, then tell me why we need bible, priest or church to keep up such a ghostly farce?
 3. Is the whole theological torture a brazen clerical lie?
 4. Why not call it then by its right name, a priestly imposition?

The work will embrace over ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY of the characters to whom the world owes so much for the progress it has made in the evolution of thought, truth and reason.

An important feature will be to give the death-bed incidents of the characters treated, so far as possible, thus disproving the false assertions so often made, that Unbelievers and Infidels recant upon their death-beds.

The work will be printed on new type, good paper, and will be bound in good style. Price, by mail or otherwise, THREE DOLLARS.

No money required until the work is ready to deliver; and after received, if it is not worth the price, and does not give satisfaction, and is returned in good order, the money will be refunded. Those wishing the work, will make application as below, that it may be known how large an edition to print.

All who feel disposed to contribute to the cause of Free-thought and to a better knowledge of those in the centuries that are past by taking a copy of this book are requested to send in their names to the author and publisher.

"Born Again."

Must we be born again?

That is what they say.

Why?

Reason enough why! Bless your dear souls, don't you see we were not born in the right shape the first time? They who got us up had not God's likeness in all their thoughts. They were controlled by animal forces. They got us up in their own likeness. Animal forces have the ascendancy.

We must be born again, to give the spiritual—intellectual, if that suits better—the power to hold the animal in subordination.

Sensible people are taking the matter into consideration.

They will begin, pretty soon, to get up children under right forces—in good shape—in the likeness of God. Then, once borning will be all sufficient. 'Twill save a deal of wear and tear, and be a better job entirely.

Death.

BY FREDERIC R. MARVIN, M.D.

The history of death may be divided into three periods: the fabulous, superstitious, and philosophic. These periods are not separated from each other by any line of demarkation; they blend as colors do, and it is impossible to say where one ends and another begins.

The most ancient period is that of Fable; a period in which imagination and fancy triumphed, and celebrated their victories in bronze and marble. In the Age of Fable, men personified the powers of nature and the passions and operations of the mind. They looked on the same universe on which we gaze, but with different eyes. They looked on this earth, but where we see mica, granite, and quartz, they saw ancient Terra, mother of the mountains, seas, and heavens. They looked on the same sky on which we gaze, but where we see constellations and systems, they saw gods and heroes, gathered in council or engaged in battle.

The Age of Fable was one of impulse; in it caprice wore all the authority of conviction, and the lightest suggestion carried with it a weight now almost inconceivable. True, the ancient world was the world of Plato, Aristotle, and Socrates, but for every philosopher there were thirty gods who had nothing better to live for than the caprice of the moment—gods and goddesses who were carried hither and thither, by anger, fear, love, and jealousy, as leaves are carried by the wind up and down the pathway of forests.

But among all the fickle deities of the early world there were a few of whom it might be said that they are the same yesterday and to-day, if not forever. Such a deity was Mors or Death, daughter of Night. The Roman artists seldom painted Mors, and the Greek sculptors never carved the goddess in marble. Our representations of her are taken from the ancient poets, who seem to have enjoyed the horrible. She was represented as wild, ravenous, and furious. Her open mouth gaped like a grave, and her long, disheveled hair fell like a mantle over her thin and bony shoulders. Her face was pale, wan, earthy, dead, and wore the pinched expression of a corpse. The glance of her eye was fatal. Men trembled before her, for she was inexorable—no prayer could move her to mercy, no tear excite her to pity. Without warning, and unannounced, she thundered at the doors of mortals to demand her debt. The king and the slave were alike to her, there were no shields against her wrath, and there was no method in her destruction.

Mors was sometimes represented as a skeleton clothed in a black robe with snow-white fringe. This robe was covered with stars and surmounted by a crown of black rings, giving the impression that her halo had burned out, and left nothing but a dead cinder on her fleshless skull. To her men built no temples and dedicated no altars; she had neither priest nor festival. When they saw her rude statue on the public road they wound their mantles about their faces and hurried away.

I have outlined the Greek conception of death. Before the Greeks were a nation, the early Egyptians had statues and paintings of Death in the rock temples of the Nile. But I will not speak of other mythologies, let the Grecian stand for them all. The second age was that of Superstition. It was characterized by a gradual but complete revolution in public faith. The grand old gods of the pagan world receded, and a rabble of saints with painted wings and flaming nimbi usurped their places. "The gentle dryads forsook the groves, and decayed and decrepid hermits hid themselves under the sacred shade." Perhaps the most characteristic feature of the age was the metaphysical view it entertained of death. To the mediæval world, death was the immediate devitalization of a body, and the liberation of an immortal soul. There were no processes of death; death was instantaneous and radical. Death never began at the heart, brain, or lung—it took place in every atom of the body at once. It did not consist in disintegration or metamorphosis of tissue—it consisted in the separation of soul and body. Against such views of death this age protests. There are two methods of studying this subject, the physical and the metaphysical, the last of which takes into account the existence of a soul. Aristotle describes three souls: the soul of plants, the soul of animals, and the human soul. The first is unconscious, the second consists in the union of mind and matter, and is conscious, and the third is immaterial, immortal, and conscious. Among various religions and philosophies there have risen seven theories with regard to the destination of the soul; they are annihilation, reabsorption, resurrection, conveyance, recurrence, migration, and transition. Of the soul I shall say little. If it exists it is indestructible and deathless, for, by definition, it is without parts, and whatever is devoid of parts cannot decay, since decay is a disintegration of parts; and, as death is my subject, that which is deathless is foreign to the matter in hand. Only organisms die. Of the two classes of organisms, animal and vegetable, only the former will demand our attention.

Several years ago I endeavored by careful experiments to determine the order and nature of the phenomena of death. I selected four healthy dogs, which a few hours after feeding them, were subjected to the following operations: To one dog was administered arsenious acid. An hour and eight minutes after full development of tonic symptoms, the animal expired. The phenomena of death could not be completely separated from those of poisoning. Those which were separable occurred in the following order: increased rapidity and corresponding weakness of pulse, intervals of cardiac-pulsation lengthened but not otherwise interfered with; dilatation of pupil; coldness beginning at the extremities and gradually invading the frame. Four and a half minutes after the cessation of respiration the heart pulsated. I immediately cut down upon that organ, it continued to pulsate fifty seconds after exposure. So soon as pulsation ceased I cut into the right auricle where I found venous blood.

The second animal was destroyed by introducing a needle into the medulla oblongata—respiration and pulsation were promptly suspended.

The third animal was bled to death. Cardiac-pulsation and respiratory effort seemed to fail at the same moment. I observed the order in which the special senses departed. Twelve minutes from the commencement of the operation the animal labored for breath. I then tested the special senses. I pronounced the dog's name and obtained the usual response, it wagged its tail, licked my hand and appeared to recognize my presence. I tested the senses of taste with substances of strong and persistent flavor. The dog exhibited its usual discrimination in the selection of esculent articles. I operated on the senses of smell and sight—on the former with volatile salts, and on the latter with flames and colors; they both responded to the test. The latter, however, was considerably impaired. I tried the sense of feeling by heat and cold, and, so far as I could learn, it was perfect. I continued my observations up to the moment of death. The order in which the special senses disappeared was as follows: sight, taste, smell, hearing, touch.

In the fourth animal I repeated the experiment with similar results. These experiments were performed several years ago, but I have since repeated them and found the observations then taken, correct. If my experiments are of value, they establish the fact that the special senses disappear in death in the same order in which they disappear in sleep.

I have frequently witnessed death in human beings. I stood by the death-bed of a woman in whose statements I have implicit faith, and her answers to questions then asked, confirmed my confidence in the result of my previously stated experiences. After sight and voice had passed away she continued to communicate with me, answering my questions by the pressure of her finger on the palm of my hand. It is impossible to perform such experiments at every death-bed. Convulsions, syncope, mental excitement, and pain, frequently render all observations, for the purpose mentioned, fruitless. But I am sure that if scientific men would select persons from among themselves or their families who are near death, and whose final moments are likely to be free from pain and muscular and emotional excitement, and with them make an agreement, touching signs and the line of observation, they would learn much from the death-bed, calculated to throw light into the dark valley.

Death has been variously defined. Dunglison calls it "definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life." But the word function is not well selected, since it refers rather to the organs than to cells of the body, and I wish to make you believe that death begins and ends where life does—in the molecule or cell. Remember all life results directly from the segmentation or proliferation of cells, and that death is consequent upon the disintegration of cells. Cells segment to grow, disintegrate to die. Growth and decay both result from and consist in the division of cells; in the case of growth the division is segmentation, and in that of decay it is disintegration. Life and death then start in the cell. What do we understand by a cell?

By a cell we used to mean a sack and its contents, but we no longer mean the sack, we mean the contents. A cell may or may not have a cell-wall, for the wall is no essential element in the cell substance. The fundamental form of the cell, and the form which is always preserved in those cells which occupy fluids, as do the blood corpuscles, is spherical. Later in the lives of most cells, their textures assume characteristic forms. Thus we have the polygonal in pavement epithelium; the conical in ciliated epithelium; the squamous in epidermic scales; the cylindrical in cylinder epithelium; the fusiform in contractile fibre-cells, and the caudate, polar, or stellate in gray nervous tissue. Our bodies are composed of these cells—hundreds, thousands, millions of them. The convolutions of the brain alone are supposed to contain 134,000,000,000 of them packed away in its gray tissue. Each of these cells has a separate life which it would retain for a time were it removed from the body. And not only a separate life, but a separate and distinct birth, history, and death. Our bodies are composed of these little living points—take them away and you have beside the fluids of the system only a few shreds of connective tissue left.

Fluids constitute the largest portion of the body, and it is well known that a man's size and weight may be reduced by evaporation. Scientists assert that by exposure to a process of evaporation the human body may be reduced to twelve or fifteen pounds. It is known to all of you that perfectly dry mummies are sometimes found to weigh only seven or eight pounds. Out of the twelve or fifteen pounds to which the human body may be reduced, ten or thirteen pounds will be found to be cellular.

Every man may be reduced to a single cell in his mother's ovary. It is by the segmentation of the cell that he has grown to be the man he is, and it will be by the disintegration of the cells that compose his body that he will finally die and decay.

These cells have different periods of birth and death. Every moment they are being formed and destroyed—you are the aggregate of these cells, and are being formed and destroyed every moment. There are no particles in your body that were there when you were a child, and in a few years there will be no particles in your organism that are there now. Your body is not the identical body you possessed yesterday—it is not exactly the same body with which you entered this room. Every moment cells are dying and springing into life. Nothing lives or dies in the universe but cells. When the cells which compose your body die, you will be dead and not before, for you are the aggregate of those cells. The cells which constitute your body die individually—they do not all die at the same moment—there is no such thing as death en masse. Sudden death is a fancy—an illusion—we die with the utmost deliberation.

Take a man who falls apparently dead and is buried the next day; remove him from the grave on the third day; his senses are abolished, his thought has ceased, his organs perform none of their functions. He is cold, motionless, rigid, and perhaps putrefaction has set in. He is everything that goes to make a corpse. Place a little fibre of that man's tissue under a microscope and watch it a few moments. It moves, it displays vital action—the cell lives. That life is identical with the life which now animates you. There are at this moment dead cells in your body, and after you are called dead there will still be living ones there.

Herbert Spencer, in his Principles of Psychology, says: "The organic force with which life begins constrains chemical affinity to work in special modes for the formation of special products; when it is spent or disappears, chemical affinity is at liberty to work in its general modes; and that is death. Life is the combination of action; the imperfection of this combination is disease, its arrest is death. In other words, life is the continuous adjustment of relations in our organism with relations in its environment. Disturb that adjustment and you have malady; destroy it, and you have death. Life is the performance of functions by an organism; death is the abandonment of an organism to the forces of the universe."

But organs are merely names for groups of cells performing the same function.

A corpse is a more interesting subject than most of us believe. It is a problem in physics—a chemical problem which Nature never fails in solving, and which we may solve by art if we will. So soon as somatic life ceases, all the cells which compose the body start on their journey to the vegetable and inorganic worlds. The body, no longer capable of entangling the forces of the universe in its wonderful web of nerves, arteries, and veins, and of using them to further its own ends, is handed over to those forces, to be, by them, resolved into its original elements. It must be resolved into two groups.

1. Carbonic acid (CO₂), water (H₂O), and ammonia (NH₃).

2. Mineral constituents, more or less oxidized, elements of the earth's structure, lime, phosphorus, iron, sulphur, magnesia, &c.

The first group passes into the air and becomes food for plants, while the second enters the earth and enriches it. We must all at some time be resolved into carbonic acid, water, ammonia, and the mineral elements. A description of the process by which this revolution is effected is unnecessary, and the benignity of their office is apparent.

Nature sustains a balance between animal and vegetable life. That balance has not always existed. In the Carboniferous Age, plant-life reached a luxuriance of which we can now form but a faint idea. The Carboniferous Age was, as its name indicates, characterized by an atmosphere loaded with carbonic acid. Not until the air became respirable for man, did the human race appear. Plants and animals make each other's existence possible. Animals inhale oxygen and nitrogen, and exhale carbonic acid, watery vapor, and a trace of animal matter in a gaseous form. Plants reverse the process, they consume carbonic acid and yield oxygen. Thus by constantly breathing each other's breath, man and his neighbor, the tree, live. What then becomes of the first group into which we are converted by the beautiful chemistry of death? It goes into the air and fills the millions of open mouths of vegetables. The hungry plants consume the carbonic acid which would otherwise render the air irrespirable for man.

The carbon separated and assimilated comes to form vegetable fibre. The wood that burns merrily in your fire-place, the food and wine that make you strong and healthy, the crimson foliage of Autumn, and the golden grain of harvest have thought, sorrowed, and loved, and dreamed the little dream of life, a thousand times, and shall yet dream it again, and you have been, and shall be, like them.

Death is usually divided into somatic and molecular. Somatic death is such as effects the whole organism. Molecular such as effects a definite number of molecules.

"The sphere of force which is the primitive basis of a cell, spends itself in the discharge of its work," says Mr. Alger in his valuable work on the "Doctrine of Immortality." The amount of vital action which can be performed by such living cells has a definite limit. When that limit is reached, the exhausted cell is dead. No function can be performed without the disintegration of a certain amount of tissue. This final expenditure on the part of a cell of its force is the act of molecular death and the germinal essence of all decay. This organic law rules in every living structure, and is a necessity inherent in creation. . . . Wherever we look in the realm of physical man, from the red outline of the first Adam to the shapeless adipose of the last corpse when fate's black curtain falls on our race, we shall discern death, for death is the other side of life.

The growth of plants and animals depends on the subordination of their cells which yield their little lives for the perfect life of the whole. "The formation of a perfectly organized plant," says Leibnitz, "is made possible only through the continuous dying and replacement of its cells." Even so the cells which compose our structures die that we may live, and in like manner our death is necessary to the growth and development of the race. We are the separate cells that constitute the one man Humanity. His integrity depends on our subordination. The greater our subordination, the more perfect his structure.

Permit me to use another quotation from Mr. Alger's valuable work, before leaving this part of my subject. "In the timid sentimentalist's view, death is horrible. Nature unrolls the chart of organic existence, a convulsed and lurid list of murders, from the spider in the window to the tiger in the jungle, and from the shark at the bottom of the sea to the eagle against the floor of the sky. As the perfumed fop in an interval of reflection, gazes on the spectacle through his dainty eye-glasses, the prospect swims in blood and glazes with the ghostly phosphorus of corruption, and he shudders with sickness. In the philosophic moralist's view the dying panorama is wholly different. Carnivorous violence prevents more harm than it inflicts. The wedded laws of life and death wear the solemn beauty and wield the merciful functions of God. All is balanced and ameliorating. Above the slaughter-house struggle, soar safely the dove and the rainbow. Out of the charnel blooms the rose to which the nightingale sings love. Nor is there poison that helps not health, nor destruction which supplies not creation with nutriment. Death multiplies the number of those who enjoy the prerogatives of life. It calls up ever fresh generations with wondering eyes and eager appetites, to the perennial bouquet of existence.

The benevolence of death is boundless; it is equaled only by the benevolence of life.

We place life and death over against each other as though they were antipodal, but they are not. The opposite of life is inorganicism, not death. Death is the transition from organism to inorganicism. The stone is the opposite of the living man—the corpse is the station between. Doubtless every particle of dust on the globe has passed an hundred times from the organic to the inorganic world and back again.

Life and death seem separate and distinct facts in the universe, but in the light of careful study the walls by which they are separated dissolve, and they are seen to be different sides of the same destiny—the results of law. That which now lives, once died, and that which once died now lives.

"Life evermore is fed by death,

In earth, and sea, and sky:

And, that a rose may breathe its breath,
Something must die."

We look upon the statue with very different emotions from those with which we look upon a corpse. One we at once recognize as the work of art, and the other as the work of death. The fingers that lightly glide over the smoothness of one are drawn with horror from the coldness of the other. Men who faint in the dissecting-room stand or sit at ease in the sculptor's studio. A wide difference is supposed to exist between the scalpel and the chisel, but no such difference exists. Every atom of marble in the statue once, long before man trod the planet, lived and suffered, and was glad, and died. Those little, shining atoms of marble are the skeleton of animalculæ—millions of minute animalculæ that were fused in the heat of central fires, beneath great oceans years ago. The statue is a corpse—aye, a congeries of corpses. The microscope reveals their disk-like structures with wonderful perfection. The marbles of Phidias once throbbed with life, and the old gods of Greece and Rome were not always deaf, and dumb, and blind, but no one worshiped them until they were so.

The corpse in its grave is not wholly dead, nor will it ever be so. There are laws at work in its organism that do not work in stones, and waves, and earth. Processes that will go on until its animal life shall have been exchanged for the life of trees, and grasses, and shrubs, until

Beneath the gnarled oak Beats human blood,
And thought lies hidden
'Twixt leaf and bud.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to say where molecular death begins. From the molecule it invades the organism—its invasion is revealed in the organism—its origin is hidden in the molecule.

Somatic death may begin in the heart, lungs, brain, gray matter of the medulla oblongata, or, perhaps, in the blood. When it begins in the heart the patient dies of syncope or ashenia; when it begins in the lung the patient dies of asphyxia; when it begins in the brain the patient dies of apoplexy; when it begins in the gray matter of the medulla oblongata death results from paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves; when it begins in the blood the patient is said to die of necremia.

The population of the earth has been assumed to be 1,000,000,000, and a generation is supposed to last 33 years; in that time 1,000,000,000 of people must die. Consequently the number of deaths will be approximately:

Each year.....	33,000,000.
" day.....	82,109.
" hour.....	3,421.
" minute.....	57.
" second.....	1.

Among 10,000 persons, one arrives at the age of 100 years. One in 500 attains the age of 90, and one in 100 lives to 60. In the midst of this fearful mortality we are living with the calmness of immortals.

According to the quarterly records for the year 1873, the annual death-rate per thousand of population in the cities named, was as follows:

The following table furnishes the population, number of deaths, and the deaths to 1,000 persons living, in most of the principal cities of the United States for the year 1873:

The highest death-rate in the United States was given by Memphis, viz: 46.6 in each 1,000 inhabitants; in Savannah the mortality was equal to 39.2 in each 1,000 inhabitants; in Vicksburg, 36.5; in Troy, 34; in Hoboken, 32.9; and in Newark, 31.6.

The earth we tread is a vast cemetery. The stones under our feet are written over with histories and strange legends of the dead, histories and legends no eye will ever read and to which no ear will ever listen. Scientists have amused themselves with speculations as to the number of human beings that have walked the planet since the Age of Man began. Such speculations must of necessity be crude and imperfect, but their tendency is to an enlarged view of the history of the race, and for the benefit of the curious I record the result of such speculations. It is asserted by scientific writers that the number of persons who have existed on our globe since the beginning of time amounts to 36,627,843,273,075,000 (for every year, however, since 1870 the number 33,000,000, being that of the annual mortality, must be added). These figures when divided by 3,095,000—the number of square leagues on the globe—leave 11,320,689,732 square miles of land; which, being divided as before, give 1,314,623,076 persons to each square mile. If we reduce these miles to square rods, the number will be 1,853,174,600,000; which, divided in like manner, will give 1,283 inhabitants to each square rod, and, these being reduced to feet, will give about five persons to each square foot of terra firma. It will thus be perceived that our earth is a vast cemetery. On each square rod of it 1,283 human beings lie buried, each rod being scarcely sufficient for ten graves, with each grave containing 128 persons. The whole surface of our globe, therefore, has been dug over 128 times to bury its dead!

The dead are everything, they are everywhere, under our feet, over our heads, and on every side. They are in the solid earth on which we stand, the unfathomed oceans that girt our continents, and through the spaces of the air they ride on every wind. Not formless phantoms changed in the twinkling of an eye, nor spectre wrought from the texture of a dream, nor sentient vapors whose immortality consists in a defiance of the chemist and the naturalist; but real and tangible is the perfume of the lily and the whiteness of the snow; the motion of the wave and the hardness of the rock; the richness of the harvest, and the primeval grandeur of the forest. In the language of an American poet:

"Yet a few days, and these

The all-beholding sun shall see no more
In all his course; nor yet in the cold ground.
Where thy pale form was laid with many tears,
Nor in the embrace of ocean shall exist
Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim Thy growth to be resolved to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements—
To be a brother to the insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
Turns with his share, and trends upon. The oak Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mould.
Yet not to thine eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriachs of the infant world—with kings,
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good—
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulchre."

Is death painful? Death in itself, per se, is painless. The disease or accident leading to death may cause the keenest anguish, but death itself is painless. This must be so; if it were not we should be in pain all our lives, since there are not moments when death is not occurring within us—molecular death, and there is no death in the universe which is not finally molecular. No man ever feels death, for the senses fail as life recedes, and the struggle for breath is without pain.

It is true that persons frequently die in a state of body torture. Drunkards dying in mania a potu, are haunted to the last by terrific visions, and a man may die with a heart so oppressed with guilt and remorse that the light of heaven is transformed into darkness, and the common air peopled with demons; but all such phenomena are those of disease, and not of death.

It is not so certain that death at the stake is intensely painful after the first scorch of the flames. In a curious article on the "Curiosities of Death," Mr. Dodge speaks of the endurance of Bishops Hooper and Ridley. Bishop Hooper lived in the fire forty-five minutes, and died with perfect calmness. His legs were charred and his body blistered before the pile was entirely ignited, the wind blowing the flames aside, and the fire being twice re-fed with fagots. Ridley at first struggled in agony, but afterwards became quiet as if the sense of pain was gone. Robert Smith, being well nigh half burned, and clustered together like black coals, suddenly rose upright before the crowd, lifted his arms as if in defiance of his enemies, and clasped his hands together.

Sir Charles Blodgen, died in his chair while taking coffee with Guy Sussac and Bertholter, and that so calmly that there was not a drop spilled from the cup in his hand. Dr. Black, also, died so composedly that the milk in the spoon which he held to his lips was all preserved. Dr. Wallston watched with scientific interest the gradual failure of his own vital power. Dr. Cullen whispered in his last moments, "I wish I had the power of writing, for then I would describe to you how pleasant a thing it is to die." The last words of many prominent men have been preserved, indicating that, to their authors, death was painless. The last words of Dr. Adam of Edinburgh, the high-school headmaster, were: "It grows dark, boys, you may go." The last words of Goethe were: "Draw back the curtains and let in more light." The last words of Sir Walter Scott, addressed to Lockhart, were: "Be a good man, my dear." The last words of Charles Matthews, were: "I am ready." The last words of John Knox, were: "Now it is come." The last words of George Washington, were: "I am about to die, and I am not afraid to die." The last words of Thomas Hood, were: "Dying, dying." The last words of Keats, were: "I feel the flowers growing over me." And the last words of Tasso, were: "Into thy hands, O Lord, do I commit my spirit."

It is a popular belief that sensibility remains for a time after decapitation. It is said that Charlotte Cordoy's cheeks blushed at the exposure of her person; that the eyes of Madame Roland opened as if in surprise; that the lips of Phillip Egaliti curled in scorn when his head was held up to the multitude, and that the lips of Mary Stuart, under similar circumstances, prayed visibly. The belief is fallacious. Bounafont had ready near the guillotine, under which two Arabs were to be executed, vessels with pulverized plaster, placed on a low table. His friend, associated with the experiment, was provided with a small speaking trumpet and a sharp-pointed probe.

At the instant the first head fell, it was placed in one of the vessels containing the plaster, in order to arrest hemorrhage. The speaking-trumpet was then applied to the ear of the head, and the man's name shouted through it, but there was neither motion of the eyelids nor corrugation of the brow; the eyes were dull and motionless, the complexion colorless, the expression of the face not indicative of pain. Neither were the muscles contracted upon being pierced with the tube. With the second head the results were the same. The syncope induced by the section of the large arteries instantly produced death.

Says Rev. O. B. Frothingham, in a printed sermon on the paternal aspect of providence: "One who narrowly escaped death by drowning, told me that the process of it after the first moment of agony was too delicious to describe." "To die of cold," he continues, "is, when the first pangs are over, a luxury, for the senses are steeped in slumber, a soft numbness takes possession of the brain, an irresistible lethargy overpowers the will, ravishing visions float before the imagination, and in ecstasy the spirit takes its flight."

Alas, what phantoms we create, how like children left in the dark we cry at the approach of death. We shrink from the grave as though it were a torture-chamber. But we cannot thwart the everlasting destiny, nor stay the wheel of time for a single moment. The earth has the same claim upon us that we have on it, and when it shall have served us long enough we shall serve it. No partiality—no monopoly—the lily in the valley, the grass in the meadow, and the oak in the forest, have an interest in us, and an interest we shall not fail to meet.

With regard to premonitions of death, I can say no more than John Hunter said years ago. "We sometimes feel within ourselves that we shall not live, for the living powers become weak, and the nerves communicate the intelligence to the brain." Dr. Hunter's own death afforded an illustration of the phenomena of which he presented so rational an explanation.

Concerning the celebrated historic premonitions of death, it is well to play the skeptic. The disease of Fletcher, which caused him to send for a sculptor and order his tomb; the salutation of Wolsey, so eloquently dramatized; the whining cant of Foote, when Weston died. "Soon shall others say, 'Poor Foote!'" and the last picture of Hogarth, which he entitled "The End of Things," adding "This is the end," are to be regarded only as curious coincidences.

The "lighting up before death" so often noticed in patients who have remained sometimes for weeks in a semi-unconscious condition, is often referred to psychological causes, when, in reality, it is due to the presence of venous blood in the brain, caused by the non-arterialization of the blood. Thus the mind often dwells on visions of coming glory or shame, and contemplates heaven or hell. Shakespeare makes Queen Catherine, in Henry VIII. say: "Saw you not even now a blessed troop invite me to a banquet, whose bright faces cast a thousand beams upon me like the sun; they promised me eternal happiness, and brought me garlands, my Griffith, which I feel I am not worthy yet to wear?"

The same phenomena mark the rise and decline of life. The circulation of the blood first announces existence, and ceases last. The right auricle pulsates first and does not cease until death. The mind loses the faculty of association; judgment gives place to recollection, and the senses vanish, as we have seen, in succession. The ruling passion, though concealed from infancy, is revealed in the hour of death, and the thoughts of boyhood bound into the sunset of declining age.

At the moment of death there become disengaged from venous blood certain gasses which are normally confined therein, and which form a pneumatosi—a swelling of the veins. This action in the veins of the retina, says Mr. Bonchut, is easily appreciable by the ophthalmoscope, and constitutes an immediate and certain sign of death. The pneumatosi is induced by the interruption of the column of blood, and is comparable to that observed in an interrupted column of a colored alcohol thermometer.

A few hours after death, generally from seven to ten, a rigidity takes possession of the body. This rigidity, which physicians call rigor mortis, is not confined to the muscles, but is manifested in the blood-vessels and heart. The rigidity may be removed for a few hours by the injection into the arteries of the corpse of oxygenated defibrinated blood. If the body be uninterfered with, the rigidity will disappear after thirty-six or forty hours, when the body will be as pliable as at the moment of death. If the body be weakened or emaciated from great suffering, or long sickness, the rigidity comes on sooner, but does not last so long. Physicians are not agreed as to the course of this rigidity.

As the rigidity passes away, the beauty so peculiar to the human face in death becomes more and more manifest, and is nearest perfection three days after death.

THERE are 1,500,000 Baptists in the United States, and only 260,000 in England. Virginia alone has as many as Maine. New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts put together. The denomination is very popular with the negroes.

Letter from D. R. Burt.

[We feel a certain delicacy in laying the following letter before our readers. The writer, as well as the parties alluded to, are friends, against whom we have not the slightest ill-feeling. We have already inserted in our columns three other articles of a somewhat different character but upon the same subject, and we cannot in justice refuse Friend Burt a hearing. Either of the parties named shall have the same opportunity if desired.]

MR. EDITOR: I have noticed a communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER for August 1, over the signature of C. A. Codman, in which he seeks to be enlightened upon the Boston Association for building the Paine Memorial Hall, and propounds the following interrogatories: 1st, "What has the Boston society done to affect an organization?" 2d, "How many trustees has the Boston society?" 3d, "Are there any ladies belonging to the Board of Trustees?" 4th, "What are the names of the trustees to whom James Lick made his donation?" A copy of the deed or instrument under which they hold the trust for posterity, was also called for.

You referred Mr. C. to the conductors of the Boston Investigator, they being two of the trustees who, if they desired, could give the information sought, which you courteously offered to copy. Two months have passed, and I have seen no reply to the questions from that source. I have also seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER an article over the signature of A. K. Butts, in which he refers to Mr. Codman's enquiries without answering any one of them, but put in special pleading for certain men whom he says have always been honest, and are the proper persons for the Liberal public to donate money to. He advised the confiding people to pay into their hands upwards of $70,000, to be paid out for property controlled and held by, and in the names of P. Mendum, H. Seaver, T. L. Savage, personally, to them and their heirs forever. Towards said property Messrs. Mendum, Seaver and Savage have applied all the money held in trust for lecturing purposes and a Memorial Hall, amounting to nearly $40,000, without warrant or order from the proper officer of the Board of Trustees, as Mr. Altman affirms, save $5,000. and that under protest, and with not the shadow of security given, that it shall be perpetuated one hour for the purposes intended. These are the men Mr. B. urges the people to pay their money to, and for purposes above stated, assuring them that these men have always been honest. It was not the past lives of any men that Mr. C. made enquiries about, understanding it doubtless to be the duty of all men to be honest; and that though a man spend a life of three score years honorably, it affords no immunity for wrong-doing; and that one act of premeditated dishonest breach of faith should sink him below the favorable consideration of honorable men.

To the first enquiry, "what have the Boston society done to effect an organization?" I will say that in consultation with Mr. Mendum, July, 1866, he informed me that he had presented the subject of a Memorial Hall to the Liberal Convention at Philadelphia, and that they rejected it. I urged upon him at that time to appoint a Board of Trustees for the same object as a nucleus around which could cluster the principles and aid which would develop and bring forth a memorial to Paine and a home for The Investigator. I have also often consulted with Mr. B. F. Underwood upon the same subject, and he fully seconded the movement. About the first of November, 1870, he wrote a letter over the signature "Old Subscriber," published in The Investigator, in which he proposed, planned, and placed in shape the crude ideas of Mr. Mendum, myself and others on that subject, which was approved by Mr. M. (as well as myself), endorsing Mr. U's plan, save the cost, which he put at $35,000, which I urged should not be less than $50,000.

The plan so clearly presented by Mr. U. I frequently urged upon Mr. M., insisting that he appoint himself, Mr. Seaver, and others, as a Board of Trustees, and to publish the same, which he did, and the said plan was adhered to and followed until the lamentable departure of the three trustees, to wit, Mendum, Seaver, and Savage, as stated by Mr. Altman, in THE TRUTH SEEKER for Sept. 15, in violating their own instructions and resolutions as to the purchase of the lot and the cost of the building.

To the second enquiry, "How many trustees has the Boston society?" Mr. Altman and myself, say five; Mr. Mendum has said three.

Thirdly, There are no women attached to or belonging to the Board of Trustees.

Fourthly, The names of the trustees to whom Mr. Lick made his donation of about $20,000 (one-half to be held and used in aiding in the construction of a Memorial Hall in honor of Thomas Paine), and one-half to sustain lecturers in the field, were J. P. Mendum, H. Seaver, T. L. Savage, M. Altman, and D. R. Burt, to them and their successors forever.

In answer to the question, "how the property is held, and the nature of the instrument under which they hold the trust for posterity," I have before stated that there is no such instrument, having the least intimation that there exists any such property in the hands of any one. But there is a deed, properly recorded, of the property in the names of J. P. Mendum, H. Seaver, T. L. Savage; to them, individually, and their heirs forever on which the Paine Memorial Hall is erected. For the erection of this building, the money held in trust by the Board of Trustees, for lecturing and memorial purposes has every dollar been paid, and on January last the property was encumbered with a mortgage of $40,000, and since that time there has been another claim of $30,000 placed upon it, but for what purpose I cannot say.

Mr. Altman in his article alluded to briefly charges those men with violations of trust and instructions to which they gave their assent and voted for, when the Board held a regularly called meeting. Let us examine the charges a moment: the Building Committee was instructed to purchase a lot in the name of the trustees, and erect thereon a hall, at an expense not exceeding $60,000.

Did they act in compliance with these instructions? I have already shown that they did not. The Treasurer (Mr. Mendum), also was instructed not to pay out any money on any order or draft without the approval of the Secretary (Mr. Altman). Was this regarded? They took the last dollar, in violation of all understanding or instructions except, as before stated, the $5,000.

I endorse Mr. Altman's statement save where he had expressed the hope that they acted honestly. I move that those words be stricken out, and leave it with the people to pronounce upon it.

I wish to say that I wrote to Mr. Mendum that I was ready and willing to assume all the responsibility required of any trustee, and to forward my wife's name, if necessary, to use it in the mortgage. I also made excuses for their acts to Mr. Altman, assuring him that they would make the title all correct, having been assured by Mr. Mendum that it should all be satisfactory, and this, too, up to the 28th of January last. I wrote a letter to Mr. Altman in Mr. Mendum's office to that effect on the 27th of January, and showed it to Mr. Mendum, and he gave his approval.

Judge of my surprise, disappointment and mortification upon learning from Mr. Mendum on the 30th of January, that they (Messrs. M. S. and S.) proposed to make no change of title to the property; that they also refused to acknowledge Mr. Altman and myself as trustees. This, too, by men whose interests for more than a third of a century I had unceasingly labored to promote.

I was urged in the first place to take a position on the Board by Mr. Mendum. I made objections, but he gave notice that I was one of the trustees, not heeding my objections. I had given my money, influence, and labor to the cause. It is well-known that a number of thousands of dollars went into the fund through my efforts. I gave five months time in selling the Lick property, and paid out $250 more than I received from the fund. I gave one hundred and twenty continuous days to that business and nothing else.

Years ago I refused $1,000 for legislative assistance, and had it put in his (Mr. Mendum's) hands to be used for lecturing purposes, and he knows it. I made a journey to St. Louis at my own expense, and obtained $1,000 more from the same party for the building fund.

There are many who wonder at the state of feeling existing between Mr. Mendum and myself. I can explain it in a few words. It is simply that I insisted that he and his associates transfer the property to a legal board of Trustees, in whom the property can be safely invested for posterity and accept as a successor to myself, a gentleman named, and one prominently before the Liberal public. Mr. M. positively refused, but I have been unyielding; and my efforts to accomplish it has cost me over two hundred dollars. When I last parted with Mr. Mendum I had used no language that he could take exceptions to, unless it was that I warned him that his conduct would blow the whole thing higher than Beecher's "Life of Christ." If I was wrong in this, I hereby apologize.

I have often been asked why the amount received from the Lick donation was not given in the Investigator. I sent the money to Mr. Mendum, and he received it. I wish to make a short statement in regard to the sale of that property. I negotiated two sales: the first, $3,085 better than the last. It was lost by the management of Mr. Mendum, who would not respond until he took time to consider—thus delaying the time until the chance was lost. I remonstrated at this. I next received an offer of about $20,000 in currency, and telegraphed to Mr. Mendum, and the offer was made known to the trustees, and I was authorized to sell. I did so, and forwarded the money to Mendum, save $250, about half the amount of my expenses. Mr. Mendum and all the trustees warmly approved, both by letter and orally, the manner in which I discharged that duty, and on the 25th of last January Mr. Mendum repeated the same, adding that they could not have found another man who would have done as well; but ten days after, when I had urged him to make the transfer to a proper Board of Trustees, he wrote Mr. Altman that "the Lick donation had been so frittered away that it was a reproach to the cause, and he was ashamed to give it a public notice." He did not say whether it was himself or myself that had frittered it away. I give the facts; the public can judge. I will add that I learn that Mr. Lick relieves me of all wrong in connection with that sale; but it is not so with my friend. Respectfully yours, for truth.

D. R. BURT.

A Letter from A. K. Butts.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6th., 1875.

MR. EDITOR:—If your readers will compare Mr. Altman's letter in your issue of Sept. 15th, with mine of Sept. 1st, they will see that his letter has not the slightest reference to mine, and they will look for some other letter of mine which might have called for his. But there is no other, and so we must conclude that Mr. Altman's gun has gone off at half-cock.

My letter was wholly innocent of any attempt "to explain the difference existing between the trustees," and for the most excellent reason that your readers, as such, knew of no such differences. To Mr. Altman's nervous and super-sensitive temperament is now due the credit of making public for the first time these unhappy differences. My letter was written for an entirely different purpose as any one will see who takes the pains to read it.

Mr. Altman refers to three most excellent and veracious gentlemen who, with "many others" he thinks will bear him out in saying that they know that I know nothing about the Paine Hall matter, I suppose he means. I am perfectly willing my reputation in that particular, (if it is of the slightest consequence,) and others also, should be submitted to those three gentlemen, whom I am proud to claim as my friends; especially since many weeks ago Messrs. Burt and Henderson told me the whole story. I have a part of his side from Mr. Mendum as well as a documentary offer on the part of Mr. Mendum and the remaining trustees to turn over the charge of Paine Hall to parties and on conditions which seem to me quite reasonable.

If Messrs. Mendum and Seaver had been attacked by Mr. Codman's letter I would not have offered to defend them. They are quite able to defend themselves.

If they think Mr. Altman's attack worthy, they will doubtless reply to it. I trust he will look before he next leaps upon me, else he may for the third time in his life fail to hit either me or even my shadow, but succeed in thrashing a shabby ghost of his own conjuring.

In a future number, if desired, I may submit to your readers the above mentioned "fair offer," (your words, Dr. Bennett). I have now only space to say that the darkly suspicious mind which first sowed distrust, and "differences," and insinuations of evil between such sincere, and straightforward, and honorable men as the six mentioned by Mr. Altman, is greatly to be pitied, and has much to answer for.

Will Mr. Altman take notice that I have not yet "attempted to explain any differences," but I have an explanation of them which will satisfy nine-tenths of the Liberals in the land I trust, and it is perfectly consistent with all I said in eulogy of Messrs. Seaver and Mendum in my former letter, and all that any one will say of Mr. Burt's honesty. That his—Mr. Burt's—"differences," with Messrs. Seaver and Mendum are "honest" on his part as well as theirs I fully believe. Iago's italic, honest (I hope) is utterly out of place in discussing these men.

Yours very truly,

A. K. BUTTS.

THE PAINE HALL.

MR. EDITOR: Every true Liberal must regret that any differences exist between those connected with the Paine Hall enterprise, to interfere with its success. I earnestly advise that all means be exhausted for a settlement of the difficulties before further publicity be given to the subject.

I am glad that Mr. Altman does not assert that these differences are incompatible with the best motives and intentions on the part of all the gentlemen whose names have appeared in connection with the enterprise.

Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, through the Investigator, have represented our principles for many years, and whatever mistakes have been made, the presumption is that they acted according to their ideas of propriety and duty, in the interest of the Liberal cause.

During my many year's acquaintance with them, I have found them upright and honorable men in all their business relations. I regard Mr. Seaver, the editor of the Investigator, as one of the most unselfish men I have ever known. If the action of three of the Trustees of the Paine Hall has been somewhat irregular, as is alleged—on this point I express no opinion in his communication—I think it requires no stretch of charity to ascribe it to error of judgment (as Mr. Altman is inclined to) and not to a readiness to violate a sacred trust for selfish purposes.

I have also for several years been well acquainted with Mr. Altman and Mr. Burt, and I have not a doubt, from my knowledge of the men, that whatever they have done, has been from the most worthy motives, and in what they regard as the true interest of the Liberal cause.

Now is it not possible for all these gentlemen to meet, and with the aid of such counsel as they may invite, settle this trouble amicably, and thereby prevent a controversy which, if permitted, can only be painful to every true friend of Free Thought and a positive injury to the cause in which we are all deeply interested. Respectfully,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Letter from S. P. Putnam. No. II.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Lincoln is one of the most beautiful of Western cities, and is alive with the Liberal element. The most intellectual and cultured classes have taken hold of the work with a hearty good will, and it goes forward with increasing promise. Mr. Billingsly, whose name has been often seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who is one of its staunch supporters, is one of the leaders of the movement. He ranks among the most brilliant lawyers of the state, and has great influence. There are other active and capable men who stand side by side with him. Prof. Church of Nebraska University, Mr. Copeland, minister of the Liberal Society, Mr. Tuttle, candidate for Regent of the University, all are thorough-going Liberals, bringing the best thought, the noblest purpose, and the most earnest manhood to the maintenance of intellectual liberty and growth. The Liberal Society established here is exerting a vast influence throughout the State, by bringing the latent Liberalism of the people into active play. Mr. Copeland's able and radical discourses are published in the "State Journal," and find a large reading among the scattered communities. Nebraska, destined to be one of the first States of the Union, is sure to feel in her institutions and growth the predominance of Liberal ideas.

Omaha is somewhat subdued by the "almighty dollar," and as that is hand in glove with orthodoxy, the latter flourishes. But the Liberal cause is not by any means dead, it has many strong and unselfish supporters, and they will some time, I think, consolidate and become a permanent and enlarging power.

Fremont is one of the finest and most promising places north of the Missouri. There is where our friend Shed—whose name has been seen both in the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER—is doing such a courageous work. He is not afraid to speak his sentiments upon all occasions, and, though warned that his practice as a lawyer, would be injured by the expression of his "Infidelity," he despises the cowardly plea. The result is, that he has a very large practice, for it is true all the world over, that when people go to law, they will get the services of the smartest lawyer; a dull orthodox stands but little chance with a gifted Radical, and such is Mr. Shed.

Mr. Smalls, of the Fremont Herald, is another live and able Radical, and in connection with one of the leading papers in the State, is fearlessly helping along the Liberal movement. Nebraska has, indeed, a brave company of workers, and alive to the importance of the issue, they are laying the foundations of a large and abiding success that will be felt in the ever broadening future.

S. P. PUTNAM.

COMMERCE, Mo., July 22d, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: An incident which is deemed worthy of preservation in the columns of the TRUTH SEEKER, having occurred here, I proceed to report it forthwith.

In our little village, as in most small towns throughout our land, there is a church building, to which appertains a congregation, presided over in limited ecclesiastical monarchy, by a minister of the gospel of love, assisted by certain vassals called deacons, the whole petty government being controlled by the dictation of a few diminutive Boss Tweed's, who prescribed what kind of Christianity they wanted, and the minister preached the same to order.

The ruler, the vassals, the dictators, and the worshippers, pursued the even tenor of their way, eating the bread of bigotry, and drinking the wine of superstition, all unconscious of a purer air, or fairer scenes beyond, until the arrival of a free-thinker rent in twain the rope of sand which held their ecclesiastical fabric together. His name was Crandall, and being a good singer, and acquainted with vocal music, entered the church choir, and it was his custom after church to analyze the sermons of the good minister, and the prayers of the good deacons, and to amuse himself and friends with a rehash of the aforesaid prayers and sermons, which I need not inform you were illegal, nugatory, and rapid, indeed. In short, this man Crandall was a scoffer, and sat in the seat of the scornful: much to the disgust of the good deacons, and the other pillars of the church which were gilded. Indignation meetings were held; and it was decided that Mr. Crandall should no longer be admitted to the house of worship. After which decision, no one could be found who would inform the gentleman of their action, thus leaving him in blissful ignorance of his terrible fate, until, on going to a choir meeting, he found the doors barred against him.

Then he spoke his mind freely, and reasoned with members of the flock; the result of which was, that a part of the congregation took sides with him, and, since a house divided against itself cannot stand, the choir broke up; the organ was hushed, and the unity of the congregation destroyed. And all, on account of one poor sinner, such as the god counsels them to save, and for whom Christ died. In the words of the immortal Elder Shelton, "Consistency thou art a jewel." Why! from their manner, I doubt not but these good deacons would have made an assault upon Mr. Crandall—perhaps have killed him—were it not for their cowardice and the fear of the civil law.

Yes! and the opposing members of this Christian brotherhood, even went so far as to withdraw their patronage from one another. A quit boarding with B. B. stopped buying his groceries of C. C. took his washing from D. D. will not speak to E, etc.

Did ever such a case of malevolent selfishness occur in a community of Freethinkers? And all on account of one poor, miserable Infidel. Verily! the devil hath triumphed grandly.

Sampson, slew a ten acre field full of Philistines with the jaw bone of an ass, but one Infidel hath destroyed a congregation with a wag of his tongue.

Respectfully yours,

EMANCIPATION.

W. H. CORWIN, Philadelphia, writes: Put my name down for a copy of your forth-coming book. I find THE TRUTH SEEKER a paper which I cannot do without. May the spirits, or some material power keep you many, many years in this world to battle for free thought.

WATSON KENDARDINE, Lumbersville, Pa., writes: If there is one thing I wish above all others, it is that truth shall prevail over the bigoted prejudices of the past, and that all publications which seek to bring about that desired result may be liberally supported.

OTTO WETTSTEIN, Rochelle, Ill., writes: I have taken the Investigator nearly twenty years, but yet your staunch, spicy paper has grown as dear to me as any publication that I have ever seen; and I trust that soon your financial condition may be like your mental—sound.

A DEMMLER, Farmersville, La., writes: What I have already felt for a long time, without being able to express it in words, I now find expressed in your TRUTH SEEKER. I shall endeavor to enlist, as far as I am able, the friends of truth and foes of religious humbug into the ranks of your supporters.

H. J. REYNOLDS, Albion, N. Y., writes: I thought after I saw your conversion to Spiritualism I would discontinue my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I cannot see but you are as liberal as ever. I am astonished to find how many Liberals there are who do not wish to have it known that they are such.

R. L. NICHOLS, Chatfield, Minn., writes: I think your paper is helping break the shackles that bind the minds of men and women to the old dogmas of orthodoxy. Their already rotten structure will in time fall of its own weight. Nevertheless we must keep pelting away at it. We must keep up the agitation and seek to move the minds of the masses.

JOHN F. SHERMAN, Chillicothe, Mo., writes: I have been taking your paper for some time, but of late the rush has been so great when they would arrive at our news depot, that I have been left out in the cold, and am obliged to secure some extras. Your articles and reports of the Liberal Club, are truly edifying. I shall be thankful when I can welcome THE TRUTH SEEKER every week. Every Liberal and Spiritualist in the land should feel an unusual pride and satisfaction in your noble and energetic enterprises for promulgating the truth.

ISAAC PADEN, Woodhull, Ill., writes: I am confined to my room. The infirmities of my old worn-out body are getting the advantage of me. This may be the last communication you will receive from me while on earth. I send you my honest appeal to my Infidel brethren (who are the real consistent opposers to my religious views), hoping I may live to see it published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I recommend to the world as the best paper for the present religious condition of man, that is now published.

JOHN S. CRUM, Vienna, Ill., writes: I think THE TRUTH SEEKER improves with each number. Enter my name for a copy of your proposed work, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers." I would also suggest the propriety of putting in book form E. E. Guild's "Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion." and your articles on the Bible. They will do great good, not only in the present, but in generations to come. I am anxious for THE TRUTH SEEKER to become a weekly.

R. SORENSON, Monroe, Utah, writes: I am very much pleased to find your paper is to be changed to a weekly. You may reckon on me as a life subscriber. From a great many parts of this country come complaints about the power of priestcraft, by which the people are kept in darkness. We have a great deal of ignorance and superstition and old traditions gathered here from all parts of the globe. Still we move onward. I hope the day is not far distant when light will be tolerated in this dark corner of civilization.

SECOND EDITION.

Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism.

BY N. B. WOLFE, M.D.

The constant and regular demand for this book exhausted the first edition some months ago, although a very large edition was worked off. For the second edition the plates have been carefully revised under the immediate supervision of the author. The publishers have had the paper made expressly for the second edition and the united efforts of the Author and Publishers have placed on sale a very fine and attractive appearing book. Although no expense has been deemed too great that would add to the perfection of the book; the price has been reduced one-fifth.

"STARTLING FACTS IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM" embodies some of the most remarkable and wonderful facts, ever published, and of the deepest interest to all. The truth of the history herein set forth in such graphic and absorbing style, is clearly established by the most indubitable evidence. Among the witnesses are some of the prominent members of the press, and others equally well known.

The book is a large 12 mo., 543 pp. Bound in extra heavy cloth, illuminated with four elegant steel portraits and numerous fine wood engravings.

PRICE, $2. Postage, 25 cents.

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Being a synopsis of the investigations of spiritual intercourse by an Episcopal Bishop, three ministers, five doctors and others at Memphis, Tenn., in 1855; also, the opinion of many eminent divines, living and dead, on the subject, and communications received from a number of persons recently.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "Clock Struck One" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century. A man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This anxiety is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference of which the author is a member in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

Or A TRUE HISTORY OF THE MAN CALLED JESUS CHRIST

EMBRACING

His parentage, his youth, his original doctrines and works, his career as a public teacher and physician of the people. Also, the nature of the great conspiracy against him; with all the incidents of his tragical death, given on spiritual authority, from spirits who were contemporary mortals with Jesus while on the earth.

By PAUL and JUDAS, through ALEXANDER SMYTH, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the great fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors, and we shall print a large edition to enable us to supply standing orders and all new demands. 12mo., 356 pages, cloth bound.

Price, $1 50.

New Gospel of Health:

AN EFFORT TO TEACH PEOPLE

The Principles of Vital Magnetism;

OR,

How to replenish the Springs of Life without Drugs or Stimulants.

BY ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute; Inventor of the "Pulmonometer, or Lung Tester;" Author of a "Treatise on the Curability of Pulmonary Consumption by Inhalation of Cold Medicated Vapors. Natural Hygiene," etc.

Its aim is to set before the general public the principles of vital magnetism, whereby the springs of life may be replenished without the use of drugs or stimulants. The subject matter is divided into thirty-eight sections, and purports to come from physicians who, ranking among the highest when in earth-life, have now made the attempt from the spirit sphere to communicate through an earthly medium knowledge which shall be even more powerful for good among the masses than their former labors in mortal. The ground gone over by these various contributors is wide and varied, and the hygienic hints given for self-cure are worth many times the cost of the volume.

The book is illustrated with over 120 engravings, among them being a steel plate likeness of Dr. Stone. Also a magnificent steel plate of engraving of the Goddess Hygiea.

519 pages, cloth, $2.50, postage 35 cents; paper covers, $1.25, postage 23 cents.

THE

HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "EXETER HALL."

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH. "Rich in romantic and pathetic incident." It exhibits, with a terrible array of facts, the atrocities committed by the Christian Church at various times. It shows that "the purest morals existed without the Bible," and that many of the Heathen Philosophers were as great lovers of virtue as the characters named in the Bible. Shocking instances are given of the depravity of many Christian ministers, and of the prevailing inhumanity among Christian people. "The folly of Foreign Missions, while the heathen at home are neglected, is powerfully illustrated." "On the whole it is the work of a master hand." "A work of unaffected beauty," and its most valuable feature is, all positions are proved and authorities given.

EXETER HALL.

"Beautiful, tender, delicate, and pathetic in its appeals." "A truthful portraiture of the mischievous tendencies of religion." It is a "denial of the authority and inspiration of the Bible." It portrays the "development of the practical effects of religious fanaticism as seen in the family and in society." "Altogether it is the most scorching book ever published in America since the Age of Reason."

Paper, 60c.; Cloth, 80c.

These two great works should be in the library of every searcher after truth and every lover of mental liberty. The two in paper will be sent for $1 50; in cloth for $2 20.

PRESS COMMENTS.

"One of the sharpest, most satirical poems ever brought before the American public. Logical, witty, and mirth-provoking. The subject of the rhymes is the great Woodhull-Tilton-Beecher scandal."

A rough, wide-awake Yankee, by the name of "Jonathan," a kind of a John Hay of a fellow, hauls all the characters
over the coals in a sensible manner. There is more stern logic in his off-hand hits,
than is often found in such rough-clad phraseology. The one who reads this pamphlet will never regret the investment."
—Crucible, Boston.

"Davis' new poem is in his best vein.
Racy, trenchant, suggestive, it will help people to a knowledge of the truth of the Beecher scandal, and more sensible views regarding love and marriage."—The World,

"The great mogul of Christianity, Henry Ward Beecher, is very artistically shown up in the 'Drama of Deceit.'—Philomathean,

Odds and Ends.

ANYTHING Midas touched turned into gold. In these days touch a man with gold and he'll turn into anything.

"I THINK I can suit you to a hair," said a boarding-house landlady to a bachelor applicant who had been stating his requirements. "Suit me to a hair, ma'am! I hope not; that's what my last landlady tried to do, and gave me three samples in the but-ter."

"MAMMA, where do the cows get the milk?" asked Willie, looking up from the foaming pan of milk, which he had been intently regarding. "Where do you get your tears?" was the answer. After a thoughtful silence, he again broke out: "Do the cows have to be spanked?"

A COUPLE of Yankee farmers became so inimical that they would not speak to each other: but one of them having been converted at a camp-meeting, on seeing his former enemy, held out his hand, saying, "How d'ye do, Kemp? I am humble enough to shake hands with a dog."

A MAN brought before a justice of the peace in Vermont, charged with some offense, pleaded in extenuation a natural inferiority. "I should have made a considerable figure in the world, judge," he said. "If I hadn't been a fool; it's a dreadful drawback to a man to be in that condition."

We were amused on hearing the story of an old lady whose only exclamation on hearing of the execution of a man who had once lived in the neighborhood was, "Well, I know'd he'd come to the gallows at last, for the knot in his handkerchief was always slipping around under his left ear."

A YANKEE cotemporary asks: "What are the street lamps for?" The man who doesn't know what a street lamp is for is hardly fit to sit in an editorial chair and mould public opinion. Street lamps are for weary young men to recline against at midnight, when they forget the way home.

On arriving at Calais, on her way to make the grand tour, an English lady was surprised and somewhat indignant at being termed, for the first time in her life, "a foreigner." "You mistake, madam," said she to the libel, with some figure; "it is you who are foreigners. We are English."

"It's well enough to name your boy Elias," said Aunt Hepzibah; "but for gracious goodness' sake don't name him Alias, 'cause the Alias is cutting up bad. Here's Alias Jones, Alias Brown, Alias Thompson, Alias One-eyed Jake, all been took up in New York for robbin' an' steal-in'."

"Just to think of it, my dear," said a wife to her husband as he was taking his morning dram, "what a waste of liquor! This paper says that the United States consumes ninety millions of dollars worth of spirits every year!" "Ah," responded the husband, "how I wish I was the United States."

At the funeral of his sixth wife, Mr. Bones, of New York, proffered the officiating clergyman a two dollar greenback. The minister declined it, saying he was not accustomed to receive pay for such services. "Just as you say," coolly replied the mourner; "but that's just what I have always been in the habit of paying."

A VERY practical sermonizer made these remarks on the soul-saving question: "My brethren, a man cannot afford to lose his soul. He's got but one, and can't get another. If a man loses his horse, he can get another; if a man loses his wife, he can get another; if a man loses his child, he can get another; but if a man loses his soul—good-bye, John!"

"You see, pa," said a bright twelve-year-old boy, "the way we fellows prove that if you should lose your left eye you would be stone blind, is this: you lose your left eye. Very well, then your right eye, which is all you have is the left one. But you have lost your left one, and so you have no eye at all and must, therefore, be stone blind, don't you see?" The father rushes blindly from the room.

A YOUNG lady in Chicago put a piece of wedding-cake under her pillow, and went to bed with the belief that she would dream of seeing her future husband. That evening, however, she had eaten two plates of lobster salad, about a pint of strawberries, several sweet cakes, and two large pickles, and she now says that she would rather remain single all her life than marry the man she saw in her dream.

HIS FEELINGS.—Last night, as a frisky colored youth was walking up Clay Street, he was accosted by a colored acquaintance, who remarked:

"Well, Brutus, dey say you iz in love?"
"I iz, Uncle Abra'm—I don't deny de alleged allegation."
"And how does it feel, Brutus?"
"You have stuffed your elbow agin a post or sumthin' else afore now, hasn't you, Uncle Abra'm?"
"I reckon."

"And you remembers de feelin' dat runs up yer arm?"
"I dose."

"Well, take dat feelin', add a hundred per cent., mix it wid de nicest ha'r oil in town, sweeten wid honey, and den you kin
'magine how I feel!"—Vicksburg Herald.

EQUAL TO THE CRISIS.—When at about the middle of the cross-walk she dropped a well-filled wallet out of her hand. Then the trouble began in earnest. She stooped over in front to pick it up, but her fingers could not reach the wallet by eighteen inches. She changed her parasol into her right hand, and tried to reach sideways for the wallet.
It was no go, however, for her fingers did not reach anywhere near the coveted article. She then tried to get down on her knees, but she might as well attempt to pick up a drop of water with her ear. She reached backward, but her hand only extended downward on a level with her hips.
She appeared to be much embarrassed. No one seemed to be passing at the moment who could assist her. Ah! a thought struck her suddenly. Quickly turning her parasol with the top on the ground, she glided a pretty little foot out from beneath her snow-white skirts, and with a gentle kick, the wallet lay in the concave parachute.—Cleveland Leader.

AN OBTUSE MAN.—She was a stylish young lady about 18 years old, and to accommodate a friend she took the baby out for an airing. She was wheeling it up and down the walk when an oldish man, very deaf, came along and inquired for a certain person supposed to live on that street. She nearly yelled her head off trying to answer him, and he looked around, caught sight of the baby, and said:

"Nice child, that. I suppose you feel proud of him?"

"It isn't mine," she yelled at him.
"Boy, eh? Well he looks just like you."

"It isn't mine!" she yelled again, but he nodded his head and continued:

"Twins, eh? Where's the other one?"

She started off with the cab but he followed and asked:

"Did it die of colic?"

Despairing of making him understand by words of mouth, she pointed to the baby, at herself, and then shook her head.

"Yes—yes, I see—'tother twin in the house. Their father is fond of them of course?"

She then turned the cab and hurried the other way, but he followed and asked:

"Do they kick around much nights?"

"I tell you 'tain't mine," she shouted, looking very red in the face.

"I think you're wrong there!" he answered. "Children brought up on the bottle are apt to pine and die."

She started on a run for the gate, but before she opened it he came up and asked:

"Have to spank 'em once and a while, I suppose?"

She made about twenty gestures in half a minute, and he helped the cab through the gate and said:

"Our children were all twins, and I'll send my wife down to give you some advice. You see—"

But she picked up a flower pot and flung it at him. He jumped back, and as she entered the house he called out:

"Hope insanity won't break out on the twins."—Detroit Free Press.

A PHILADELPHIA publishing house announces a book entitled, "The Kiss; its History." Such a work, properly edited, might prove of value to lovers requiring tuition in the osculatory art. But is the Philadelphia volume the compilation of the man best fitted for the delicate task, by reason of knowledge of kissing and wide experience in all its varieties? We regret to say that it is not. Mr. Bombaugh, the editor, may be a student of kisses as written by other men, but he has no general reputation himself as a kisser. The only fit editor for "The Kiss" is Henry Ward Beecher, the champion American kisser. Let Mr. Beecher get out his treatise, doctrinal and analytical, on the kiss, and the Philadelphia volume will be nowhere.—N. Y. Sun.

A CHURCH CONTEST.—A long contested church case, growing out of the suspension, several years ago, of Mr.
George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia, by the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, has recently been decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, sitting in Pittsburgh. The decision is in favor of the Fifth Reformed Presbyterian church (the Rev. Dr. McAuley's), against the First Reformed Presbyterian church (the Rev.
Dr. Wright's). In commenting upon this case, the Tribune uses this language: "The effect, not apparent, but much more momentous, we are constrained to say of this long and bitter feud, will be that of every other sectarian quarrel, the weakening of belief among the irreligious masses in the use and truth of Christianity. If the Church, composed of descendants of John Knox and other vigorous and faithful witnesses, can give up months and years of their short lives to bitter recrimination and wrath; if its members can deliberately continue to appropriate to themselves the fruit of other men's charity, and to persecute at the same time the men whose work they are seizing, they teach the world that their morality either leads to what other people call dishonesty, or they become dishonest in spite of it."

ANOTHER DRUNKEN CLERGYMAN.—Rev. August Thorbeck in Morrisania, in the upper part of this city has for five or six years been indulging in a very free use of "the ardent," and the evil habit has been growing upon him.
He gets very drunk at home and has often been seen intoxicated in the streets. The elders of the church after repeated admonitions and warnings, could endure the stigma no longer and have told him to step down and out. The clergyman also has another bad fault, that of borrowing money from all who would lend to him and forgetting to pay. Poor fallible man.

MOODY ANECDOTES.—M. D. Conway relates the following: Moody's worldly daughter, upon meeting her saintly father at the breakfast table, after her return from the theatre the night before, she was greeted with, "Good morning, child of Satan," "Good morning, papa," was her reply. Moody once asked a gentleman, "Have you found Jesus?" was immediately answered, "No; have you lost him?" In Yorkshire Moody met a profane young man at a railway junction, who entered the car swearing fearfully, because, by following mistaken instructions, he had taken the wrong train. Shocked by the young man's profanity, the Revivalist said gravely:
"Young man, do you know where you are going?" "Yes;
I am going to Halifax," was the reply. "No," replied
Moody, still more solemnly. "you are going to hell."
"On the wrong train again, by G—d!" replied the young man.

STEPPING DOWN WITH SADNESS AND GRIEF.—The Tennessee Conference have just finished the trial of the Rev.
Dr. John W. Hanner, Sr., the eloquent, and one of the oldest, and most influential clergymen in the South, for gross immorality in writing a lascivious letter to Miss Naylor, with a view of corrupting her and leading her into sinful paths. The vote against him upon the main charge was unanimous, and Bishop Wightman, with great sorrow, performed the delicate and painful duty of passing sentence upon him; which is a suspension of one year. Dr. Kelley, counsel for the accused, spoke on
too much overwhelmed by his emotion to appear in your midst. He did not know what the verdict would be. He desires to express no opinion whether it is right or wrong; but with tears rolling down his cheeks, and heart crushed by sorrow and age, he wishes to say that he believes in the righteous intentions of the committee.
With regard to the folly which he admits in writing the letter, and which has cost him such pangs of agonizing repentance, he desires to say to the younger members of the Conference: "Look upon my agony, behold my stricken old age and learn to avoid the very appearance of evil." It would be well to profit by the poor old man's sad experience; but it seems they will not learn; they will follow the luring vice; but probably they try and profit by the Elder's misfortune and endeavor to not get caught as he was.

ANOTHER FALLEN CLERGYMAN.—For some time past the habits of Elder J. V. Beckman, pastor of the Christian Church of Maroa, Ill., has been such as to cause great grief to his friends and to bring reproach on the church. He has become such an inebriate and has indulged the slavish appetite for strong drink to such an extent that it could not longer be tolerated that he break the bread of life to the faithful lambs. On a recent Sunday after the sermon he tendered his resignation and left the "sacred desk." His farewell speech was a pitiful one; among other confessions he said: "This may be my last opportunity of addressing you, and I want to ask you that you will not charge this great shame to the religion of Christ. Charge it only to my own depraved, sinful nature. I sever my connection with you with a sad heart.

It would be sad under the most favorable circumstances; but much more so as it is. Whenever you meet me, and under whatever circumstances, remember there was a time when you were proud of me. But treat me as you may, act toward me as you choose, I beg that you will remember my wife, kindly. Do not give her pain and sorrow because of my wrong doing. Poor woman she has always suffered enough. I married her, a sweet and innocent girl. She has been a patient, and faithful wife.
Again, I ask that you will kindly remember my wife and children."

"Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." (1 Tim. v. 23).

MORE HOLY ADULTERY.—This time the scene is laid at Darlington, Wis. Good Father Fitzgibbon, of the Catholic Church, has resided there twelve years, ministering to a very large congregation with great fervor and acceptance, and was highly respected by members of all denominations until a very recent date, when an event transpired which led to his disgrace and flight. Mr.
Thomas Gleason, an auctioneer and constable residing there, was married on September 5th last to Miss Catharine O'Neil by Father Fitzgibbon. The lady had been housekeeper for Father Fitzgibbon for the last six years.
She is about thirty years of age and comely and good-looking. Mr. Gleason was a widower and is about forty years of age. The match was thought to be a good one for both parties. A night or two after the wedding Mr.
Gleason heard his wife talking in her sleep and speaking in endearing terms of Father Fitzgibbon. He also discovered that she paid frequent visits to Father Fitzgib-bon's house. He then formed a plan to catch them.
Thursday, October 14th, he stated to his wife that he had business that would call him away from home two or three days; and he drove out of town as if on his usual business. But he returned early in the evening and upon entering his house found his wife was absent. He procured a witness and they went to the priest's house, and there poor Gleason made the discovery which changed his suspicions to a terrible reality.
His faithless wife soon followed him home, and stoutly denied that she had had any criminal connections with the Father, but in a short time she was forced to confess to the criminality, and that it had been of long continuance. The husband on the following morning took steps to cause the arrest of Father Fitzgibbon, but encountered much difficulty, as many friends of the priest were opposed to any exposure being made of the disgraceful affair. The husband intercepted the following letter from his wife to the priest:

"DEAR FATHER FITZGIBBON. Tom has caught us and all is discovered. I am ruined and you are lost. Pray fly! For my sake! for God's sake fly! Your loving KATE."

Father Fitzgibbon left town in the forenoon and fled to a brother priest's house at Mineral Point, where Fitzgib-bon's friends made extraordinary efforts to effect a settlement with the injured husband. The following day Gleason succeeded in obtaining a warrant for the arrest of the sensual priest, and the same was placed in the hands of the sheriff, but news had been privately conveyed to the priest and he immediately left for parts unknown.
The miserable wife is staying with a charitable lady in the village and it is said she will soon leave for California.
Mr. Gleason has commenced a suit for divorce against his wife. The lesson to be learned from this sad affair is, that the sisters should not talk in their sleep; and when their husbands say they will be absent for a few days they should be extremely cautious that they do not return suddenly and catch them in naughtiness. It is bad to be caught. Father Fitzgibbon should come on here and bring Cardinal McCloskey a present of $1,000 and it will be all right. He knows how it is himself.

Ruth's Idea of Heaven, and Mine.

BY SUSAN H. WIXON.

Ruth is one of the sweetest and best girls that I know. She is an orphan, one of three, very poor and sometimes unhappy, for her surroundings are not in harmony with her rich nature. We have many long talks together, concerning theology and other things, and her quaint ideas are somewhat amusing, and often make me laugh.

One day I asked her to tell me her ideas of heaven.

"Well," she replied, "poising her reticule on her finger, 'I suppose it is to dress in Swiss muslin every day, your robe made loose and flowing like a night-dress, with a train such as angels wear, and feast on bread and honey! It is to stand on a sea of glass, with pearls and gold, right before the great white Throne, where God sits under a white canopy. It is to go flying through the air like a kite, playing meeting-house tunes on a solid gold harp! There are mansions in heaven, glittering with diamonds and rubies, and oh! it's ever so pleasant there!'"

I laughed, and Ruth's chin began to quiver with pain and distress.

"Darling!" I said, "I would not pain you needlessly. Your ideas are the same as held by thousands of people because they've been taught it from childhood, just as you have, and never stop to think whether they are right or wrong. But that conception of heaven, Ruth, is a little behind the times. The knowledge of science and literature of advanced minds, have developed some new facts, and to-day, many, in the light of reason and common-sense are obliged to reject that crude fancy of a by-gone period; still there are a great many who cherish the same whimsical views, clinging to the old traditions, too obstinate or too indolent to think upon this, and other matters for themselves.

"But didn't our grandmothers and our great-grandmothers believe it?" questioned Ruth, and she looked as though she thought that a stunning question.

"What if they did?" I asked. "Shall we permit their beliefs or unbeliefs to bias us in our judgment? Now Ruth, my dear, let me suppose a case. You've seen my great-grandmothers dress up-stairs in the oaken chest, and the other things belonging to her, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, how would you like to see me arrayed in that suit every day? How would I look in that scant and narrow affair, so tight and uncomfortable, with the immense sleeves; that blue and white handkerchief pinned across my chest, a long blue and white apron reaching to my feet, and on my head, that great, flappy calash very much resembling Josiah Green's flying machine, or that huge 'Navarino' that made you laugh so the other day when I put it on? Now if I should wear this garb every day, and it was all thread-bare and ragged, too, my only excuse being, that as it was good enough for my grandmother, it is good enough for me, what would you think of me, Ruth, for so doing?"

"You'd look like a fright, and I would think you very stupid, and—"

"What?"

"Kind of out of your head," said Ruth, hesitatingly.

"So I should be, I think; but there is just as much sense and propriety in people wearing their grand-parents' garments as there is in retaining their ideas and beliefs, when the light shed upon them by reason and common sense, shows they belong to a day that is past. And now, my darling I want you to tell me your idea of heaven, not your mother's, nor your grandmother's, your father's nor your grandfather's idea, but your own. Close your eyes one minute, and think a little on your own account. You should always remember, Ruth, to think for yourself as much as possible, and never take another's opinion, unless fully coinciding with your own. What I mean, is that you are not to fall in with the notions of another, without giving them due consideration, and your own judgment which is good and comprehensive, will not lead you astray.

"How much, do you suppose we know, actually know, of any other world but this in which we live and move, and have a being?"

"N-o-thing!" said Ruth, looking vacantly into space.

"Well, then, to find heaven, don't let us go sailing off we know not where, or rear a castle in the air that will surely vanish into the thin air of that mysterious land of the Unknown; or send our ship away only to be swamped amid the breakers and rocks of that interminable ocean of space, and we ourselves be lost in that fierce, cold silence of nowhere; but let us search for heaven amid familiar places, and let it be real and substantial, or it will be of no benefit to us."

Ruth sat quite still, thinking. Presently she put her arms around my neck and said:

"If you won't laugh I'll tell you what I think would be a nice heaven, quite good enough for me!"

"Go on," I said, "I'm as solemn as the Pope of Rome!"

"I think, then, that if I could have beefsteak and fried potatoes for breakfast, Parker House rolls and coffee, and roast lamb for dinner, plum pudding and nice white bread and molasses, and enough of it every day, and if I could have nice new clothes like your pretty cashmere and your handsome sacque, with lace trimming, and a father and mother to take care of me and love me, and could go to school every day instead of working in that dingy old cotton mill, with the noisy machinery, and could live in a comfortable house and breathe good, pure air, and not in that creaky attic, so low and dismal, in Central Street—I do think that would be all the heaven I'd care for."

"That is a very sensible heaven, Ruth, and I wish all could have such a heaven here, for it is more valuable than ten thousand misty mansions in the skies; and sometime, Ruth, if you continue good and true, it will be yours, and more besides."

And if I live, Ruth shall yet realize that heaven upon earth—all but the father and mother—they are gone and she cannot have them again; but it is possible she may have one who will be father and mother and lover all in one, and this may compensate for the loss of the natural protectors of her childhood and youth.

"I suppose you'll tell me your idea of heaven, won't you?" asked Ruth, with a quizzical glance.

"Yes, certainly I will," I answered. "It is similar to yours, Ruth, only I don't believe I am so much of an epicure as you are, though were I deprived of plum pudding and beefsteak and the things you mentioned, I might think much more of them. My heaven, what I regard as heaven, would be heaven anywhere in this world or any other, worth more, according to my way of thinking, than the great white throne and He, who, tradition says, sits upon it, worth more than golden pave and pearly gate—than all the tales of Jehovah. Jesus and the Holy Ghost—than all the sacred saints, signs, and symbols—than ship-loads of bread and heavenly honey—than millions of golden harps and angels' misty robes—indeed its great value cannot be estimated!"

"Why, what can it be?" said Ruth, with eyes wide open and mouth agape.

"It is simply, my dear Ruth, a well-ordered home, pleasant, cheerful, well-conducted, and in every respect, a genuine home, with no make-believe about it, a sweet home indeed! full of rich and tender associations, where love reigns supreme and wisdom sits at her right hand. There is a Holy Trinity in this heaven—could you name the three composing this trinity, Ruth?"

"Father! Is that right?"

"Yes."

"Mother,"

"Right again."

"Child."

"Correct. Whenever I think of a possible paradise, with not a serpent in it, it is always in connection with three words: Husband—Wife—Child, or Father—Mother—Child. These three make the triune God of heaven, and heaven is home. What do you think of it dear?"

"I think," said Ruth, as she kissed me, "as you remarked of my conception of heaven, that it is very sensible."

Questions for Bible-Worshippers.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

A debate was held in Watertown, Wis., in 1871, between B. F. Underwood, and Rev. Mr. Haddock, in which the latter evaded many of Mr. Underwood's arguments and did not reply to them. Mr. Underwood noticing this sharp practice on the part of the reverend gentleman, proposed that each should propound a given number of questions to be answered by the other, one at a time, as given. Mr. Haddock reluctantly assented to the proposition, well knowing his refusal to do so, would, by the audience, be construed as cowardice on his part. His answers, however, were amusing; some of them evasive and others, "I don't know." "It may have been so."

"Well, what if it is so?" &c., &c.

The following are the questions propounded by Mr. Underwood:

Does not the Old Testament teach revenge? Did not Jesus so understand when he said, "Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you, resist not evil?"

Did not the Jewish law permit the nearest relative of a man who had been killed by his fellow, to follow and slay the homicide, even when the latter was excusable, if he could execute this act of vengeance before he reached a "city of refuge?" [Deut. xix. 4.]

Does not the 109th Psalm inculcate the most horrible revenge?

Is not the warmest eulogy on a woman in the Old Testament bestowed upon her, who, with circumstances of the most aggravated treachery, assassinated a sleeping fugitive that had taken refuge under her roof? [Judges v. 24.]

Does the Bible not command that, "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, let us go and serve other Gods which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; . . . thine hand shall be the first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people?" [Deut. xiii. 6-9.]

Was this command calculated to promote religious toleration and charity?

Is it not recorded in the Bible that the Lord put lying spirits in the mouths of Ahab's prophets, told them to go out on their lying mission, and promised them success? [1 Kings xxii. 21.]

Is this example calculated to promote truthfulness?

Does not the Old Testament give a man the power when "he hath taken a wife and married her, and it come to pass that she finds no favor in his eyes" . . . to "write her a bill of divorcement, give it into her hand and send her out of his house?" [Deut. xxiv. 1.]

Is not the right of the wife to get a divorce under any circumstances entirely ignored?

Did not the Jewish law require a man to marry the wife of his deceased brother—if she were left childless—whether he wished to marry her or not? And was not this marriage commanded without reference to the married or single condition of the surviving brother? [Deut. xxv. 5.]

In times when the law prevailed, when polygamy was common with the best men among the Jews, and when nobody thought it wrong, could anybody suppose it applied only to unmarried brothers?

Were not Abraham and David polygamists? Does the Bible not represent God as saying of Abraham, "He kept my commandments, my statutes, and my laws;" and of David, "He did all which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from anything that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite?" [1 Kings xv. 5.]

Do not these declarations involve approval of polygamy?

When Moses, instead of condemning polygamy, said that if a man "take him another wife, her food, her raiment, her duty of marriage, (i. e., of the first wife) he shall not diminish," does he not sanction the practice, both by silence as to its wrongfulness and by providing for its continuance?

When Moses in times of polygamy, said to the Jewish soldiers, in invading the Midianitish territory, "Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and kill every married woman, but all the women children that are virgins keep alive for yourselves," (Numb. xxxi. 17-18,) did he not sustain and command something worse than polygamy?

In commanding Jewish soldiers to seize beautiful female captives of war when they had a "desire unto them," and make them their wives by violence, and afterwards when they no longer had "any delight in them," to send them away, humiliated and outraged, (Deut. xxi. 10,) did he not sanction and perpetuate one of the most horrible practices of ancient times?

Did not the command that women should offer "sin offerings" on the birth of a child, suppose there was sin attached to motherhood? [Lev. xii. 6-7.]

Are the foregoing laws and commands calculated to inspire respect for the character of woman or to elevate her condition?

Does the Bible not sanction and command human slavery? Does it not say, "Both thy bondmen and bondmaids which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids; moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession?" [Lev. xxv. 44-45.]

Does the Bible not say that a master may beat his servant, so that he shall die from the effects of it, and yet go unpunished if the slave does not die under his hand, for the reason that "he is his money?" [Ex. xxi. 20.]

Does the Bible not provide for the sale by a master, of his own daughter, as a chattel, in these words: "If a man sell his daughter to be a maid servant, she shall not go out as the men servants do?" (Ex. xxi. 7.) Could not the new master, after making this maid servant his wife, and when she no longer "pleased him" send her away from his house? [Ex. xxi. 8.]

Is slavery calculated to elevate mankind?

When God said to Abraham after he had married Sarah, the daughter of his own father, (Gen. xx. 11-12,) "I will bless her and she shall be a mother of nations," and cause her to become a mother when she was ninety years old; and when he had said to Abraham, "I will make thee exceedingly fruitful," and when God further says, "Abraham kept my commandments, my statutes, and my laws," does it not follow that this incestuous union was approved of God? Is the example a good one, according to our present notions?

Is the Bible law that dooms to death the man who works on the Sabbath calculated to benefit us? [Numb. xv. 32.]

Is the law commanding refractory sons to be stoned to death, one that we would like to see revived?

Was the Jewish law commanding that meat unfit for the Jews, should be sold to aliens, one which we should pattern after in our legislation? [Deut. xiv. 21.]

Was the Jewish mode of treating captives of war, (Deut. xx. 10-16,) commanded by God, calculated to inspire the Jews with sentiments of humanity, or impress them with the worth and sacredness of human life?

Is human sacrifice right? Does the Bible condemn Jephtha for sacrificing his daughter? Does it not rather represent that the vow was made under the influence of "the spirit of the Lord"? (Judges xi. 29.) After he had made the vow, did not Jephtha sacrifice his child in accordance with a law in Lev. xxvii. 28-29, which required that everything, whether man or beast, devoted to the Lord, should "surely be put to death"?

Was not the hanging of two sons and five grand sons of Saul, to stop a famine that had prevailed three years for the dead king's sins, a clear case of human sacrifice demanded by the Jewish Jehovah? [2 Samuel xxi. 10-14.]

Was not the destruction of the Amalekites, for what their ancestors had done four hundred years previously, (1 Samuel xv. 1-3) and seventy thousand Israelites for an act of David, based on the idea that the death of the innocent was required to atone for the guilt of the wicked? [2 Samuel xxiv. 1-10.]

Is it desirable to introduce such a principle in the making or execution of our laws?

Are there not other causes than adultery which may furnish proper grounds for divorce?

Does not the New Testament forbid it except for this reason, and does not the New as well as the Old fail to provide for a divorce for a wronged and outraged woman?

Does not the New Testament teach, that as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything; (Eph. v. 22-24) that the husband is head of the wife as Christ is head of the Church; that women are not permitted to speak in public, but to be under obedience, as also saith the law; that they are not permitted to teach, but to learn in silence with all subjection, for the reason that "Adam was first formed, then Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the women being deceived was in the transgression"? [1 Tim. ii. 11-15.]

Is this kind of teaching calculated to elevate woman?

Did not Paul teach the principle of abstinence from marriage, except for the gratification of uncontrollable passions? [1 Cor. viii. 1.]

Does he not say, "The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit, but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband"? [1 Cor. vii. 34.]

That although marriage may be justifiable, "if a man thinks that he becometh himself uncomely toward his virgin" yet it is better not to marry at all? [1 Cor. vii. 3-38.]

Are these right views of the relations between the sexes?

Does not the New Testament say, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God; whosoever therefore resisteth the powers resisteth the ordinance of God, and shall receive to themselves damnation"? [Rom. xiii. 1.]

Does it not say, "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers"? [1 Peter ii. 13.]

Are these doctrines of unqualified submission calculated to make brave men, or to give us free governments?

Does the New Testament not say, "Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their masters, worthy of all honor"? [1 Tim. vi. 1-2.]

"Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward"? [Titus ii. 9.]

Are these teachings different from those of tyrants and oppressors in all ages?

In former times did not kings and priests incite whole nations to war, and urge them on to battle against heretic nations in the name of Jehovah, and appeal for precedent to the wars of the Jews against the heathen nations?

Has not slavery been perpetuated by the approval and sanction which the Bible gives it?

Have not the doctrines of witches and evil spirits, and the command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," caused the death of hundreds of thousands of innocent persons?

Have not the Jewish laws against heresy, and the declaration that "he that believeth not shall be damned," caused millions of human beings to be hanged, burned, stoned, butchered, or otherwise put to death, because of their opinions?

Has not the doctrine that belief is a merit and disbelief a crime, deterred thousands of earnest minds from the pursuit of truth?

Have not the teachings of the Old Testament, respecting the superiority of the Jews been a curse to that people?

Has not the belief in a Devil led men to refer their evils to other than natural causes; and by diverting their attention from the real causes, prevented or delayed the removal of thousands of evils?

Is not the doctrine that everything was right at first, but has grown bad and must ever remain bad, disheartening and discouraging, and calculated to make men croakers and misanthropes?

Has not the doctrine that woman was the first transgressor, done infinite harm to woman?

Has not the notion that labor was inflicted on man for disobedience, tended to degrade labor, to make it disreputable, and to be avoided?

Has not the doctrine of Paul respecting marriage caused thousands of beautiful women, who should have been wives and mothers, to retire to convents and shut themselves up from the active world?

Are not the teachings that we should take no thought for the morrow, and that poverty is a virtue, ruinous just as far as they are reduced to practice?

Is not the doctrine that moral goodness is insufficient to save men, injurious to the interests of morality?

Is not the doctrine that we are saved through Christ, that his blood washes out our sins, that thieves and murderers can go straight to heaven by repentance of their sins an hour before their death, and that the noblest men and women must go to hell if they fail to believe in the dogmas of Christianity, demoralizing in its tendency?

What shall we say of a religion that consigns to hell a Humboldt and Comte, a Paine and Jefferson, a Huxley and Spencer, a Parker and Emerson, a Lydia Maria Child and Harriet Martineau, and promises eternal joy to every robber and assassin, provided they "trust in Jesus" in their dying hour?

Does not the doctrine that God answers prayer, destroy self-reliance and direct our attention in the wrong direction for help?

Has not the crazy doctrine of the end of the world, taught in the New Testament, caused thousands to become insane, and thousands of others to give away their property and abandon their avocations?

Has not the doctrine of election and predestination, as taught in the 8th chapter of Romans, made men self-righteous and Pharisaical? Has not the doctrine of eternal torment caused thousands, like poor Cowper, to live in almost constant anxiety and distress? And has it not made millions sorrowful and wretched in the hour of death?

Is it not true that the Bible contains good and bad principles, and like all other books should be read with discrimination?

Christian Missions.

Of all the failures of that sublime humbug of the ages, Christianity, itself a failure and a fraud, the missionary movement has been the most complete. In India and China, and among distant islands, missionary zeal has sacrificed many votaries; and the accumulated offerings—often made up of widow's mites and gleanings from the poor—have been lavished without commensurate result. The Missionary Herald, of the American Board for Foreign Missions, dolefully says: "That only seven per cent of the population of Ceylon (2,000,000,) should profess Christianity, and that only two per cent should be Protestant Christians, will be melancholy facts pregnant with solemn reflections to many of our readers. Again it says: "If ours is the day of small things, what can we say to India with her 200,000,000 against our 2,000,000, and her less than half a million of Christians, say one fourth of one per cent against our seven per cent." In a subsequent issue of the same journal, giving an account of the Mahratta Mission, in which during the then last fourteen years over $20,000 had been expended by one society alone in its effort at conversion, it says: "The account Mr. Munger (missionary) gives of the present state and prospects of the Mahratta mission is not encouraging. Less than a dozen persons constitute his stated sabbath audience, and these are from his own family, and the Christian household connected with the mission." With respect to the Chinese missions, another American paper, the Herald, says: "The pig-tail celestials of the flowery kingdom do not take very kindly to Christianity. With 24 missionaries and 15 native helpers in China, the American Foreign Mission organization reports the baptism of a first convert. Millions of money contributed in the United States to convert the Chinese, and the result is a single baptism!" Says the Montreal Daily Witness, Feb. 1866, "There are now 25 Protestant missionary societies laboring in India. These societies maintain about 550 missionaries, and expend annually in that country not far from $1,550,000." Dr. Livingston, in one of his latest works on Africa, said that forty missionaries had been sacrificed to the deadly climate of that continent, even before the first heathen had been converted. And still restless visionaries continue to encourage the religiously romantic to wander from "pole to pole" in costly and wasteful attempts to supplant one absurdity by the propagation of another, oblivious of the personal and intellectual misery that broods around thousands of heathens at home. Says that distinguished London clergyman Dr. Pusey: "There are places in London, as I have myself seen, where for generation after generation the name of Christ has never reached, and their inhabitants had much better have been born in Calcutta than in London, because the charity which sends forth Christian missionaries would the sooner reach them." And so while missionaries "watch and pray to be able to do something" the poor unconverted heathen die and go to perdition—according to Christian theory—and the God who has promised to "answer prayer" will not open the eyes of the blind, but will witness with indifference their gradual approach to the precipice of destruction.

And so the pauper's penny, and the poor pittance of the wanting widow are snatched by the ravening wolves of a costly superstition to fit out floating palaces, freighted with Bibles, and grog and gunpowder, to carry the glad tidings of great joy to the uttermost parts of the earth. Sea and land are compassed to make one cannibal proselyte ten-fold more the child of hell, while the home-heathen, about the church doors, are let to starve, and soldiers are sent to shoot the red heathen of the West.

The Bible and the Fagot.

It may be asked; how could the Bible have existed so long and swayed such a mighty influence through all the past ages, without the overruling hand of Providence? I answer by brute force and authority. The Eden of the church which flourished in past ages was lighted by ten thousand fagot-piles, upon which the souls of thinkers went up to heaven, and the lurid glare revealed forests of gibbets, upon whose ghastly arms swung hundreds of thousands of so-called heretics.

Then it was that religion, allied with its shadow, fanaticism, came forth into the light in all its ulcerous and ghastly deformity, and propounding dogmas reeking with the slime of priestly selfishness, and blasphemous in their interpretation of the will of God, sought, by atrocities innumerable, to crush humanity, and create a race of slaves.

This monster arrayed nation against nation, and strewed the plains of Europe with the wreck of armies, leaving the bones of millions to whiten the desolate waste. There, amidst the angry shouts of combatants, the roar of engines of death, the flames of burning cities, the smoke of which concealed crimes at which demons hid their abashed faces, the cry of the widow and the orphan, the wail of unspeakable anguish of the hopeless mourner, this insatiate monster sat in tribunal, in her blood-stained garments. Her throne covered with the bones of heretical martyrs; her footstool chains and manacles; her eyes rheumy with the dust of the sepulchre; her face wrinkled with passion; her mouth gory with her feast of human flesh, she dared to proclaim the will of God! Dared? Aye, and with her sinewy hands bound the unfortunate infidel to the rack, turned the tightening screws, thrust the heated irons into his flesh, tore the quivering nerves with red hot pliers, shrieking, fiend-like, in his ear—"Believe, or be damned."

Professing to be the evangel of peace, Christianity has strewn the half of earth with the wrecks of armies and the bones of murdered millions. Its history is one of wars and persecutions, crusades and holy massacres. Established by the crimsoned hand of Constantine, perpetuated by fear, and force, and fraud, it innudated the ages with an ocean of gore. Verily Christ came to bring a sword.

At the birth of Christ there was universal peace. The temple of Janus was closed. But since that period, the so-called Prince of Peace, has indeed brought a sword upon the earth. The rivers of Christendom have run blood. "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one," commanded Christ. With a sword Peter smote off the ear of the high priest's servant. Christianity and the divine authority of the Bible were established by the sword in the great Roman world by that Christian cut-throat, Constantine. Charlemagne left the Saxons the only alternative of being baptized or butchered. The conquered were obliged to accept the Bible or death. This "Eldest Son of the Church" slaughtered 4,000 captive Saxons in one day down by the river Weser, because they would not submit to the saving ordinance of Christianity.

Three hundred millions of human beings have been sacrificed by Christian priests in their frenzied efforts to force a man-made, printed book upon mankind as the word of their God.

"And priests dare babble of a God of peace, Even while their hands are red with guiltless blood, Murdering the while, uprooting every germ Of truth, exterminating, spoiling all, Making the earth a slaughter house"

"Ask and Ye Shall Receive."

Very good. But how shall we ask? Earth and heaven are absolutely deluged with words.

Heaven, especially, is fearfully bored with words—words—words. Everlastingly teasing the Lord, for blessings—blessings he can never bestow, without violating heaven's organic law. And he won't do that.

Blessings, as well as cursings, are the result of conditions. "Whatsoever a man soweth that also shall he reap." And so of women.

"Blessed are the pure in heart." They are already blessed—blessed all the time. "In blessing, ye shall be blessed." No better way of asking a blessing, than to bless humanity, in general—and every body, in particular—by doing all the good you can. By being examples of righteousness, worthy of all imitation. The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.
No. 333 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

An Open Letter.

It is possible that some people may deem it improper that a letter addressed to the distinguished personage named below should be written, but we cannot so regard it. Countless prayers and appeals are daily made to him from all sorts of people, from all sorts of places, and upon all sorts of subjects. Every one says or asks what he pleases, and no man is authorized to dictate what shall be said. A prayer is an appeal, a letter is also a form of appeal. Any individual has a right to either form. That a letter is any more improper than a prayer is not obvious, and in this case a letter is preferred. It was first thought best to send it in the care of Messrs Moody and Sankey, the noted Evangelists now conducting business, for a limited period, at the Skating Rink in our neighboring City, and, as is largely supposed, in the immediate interest of the personage in point, as being the place of all others where a letter would be most likely to reach him; but as there is not a little uncertainty as to the precise locality where a letter or parcel would be sure to reach him, so as to receive attention, it was deemed best to insert it in these columns, believing it would attract his attention as soon in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER as any other place, from the fact that so many worthy people carefully peruse its columns. If there is any informality in the mode, it probably will make no essential difference to the party addressed. He is represented as having said "come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden." Now we labor constantly and also are heavy laden—laden with doubt and uncertainty on many points, laden, in common with many others, with a want of true knowledge, which want, is ignorance. This ignorance is very generally prevailing over the entire world. May it be dispelled!

To His Excellency, IMMANUEL J. CHRIST, otherwise called "Prince of Peace," "Sun of Righteousness," "Lion of the Tribe of Judah," "Wonderful," "Counsellor," "The Messiah," "The Redeemer," "The Savior," "The Bridegroom," "The Lamb of God," "Captain of our Salvation," "Son of God," "Son of Man," etc., etc.:

RESPECTED SIR: Learning from our daily papers that it is expected you will pass a few days in our immediate vicinity, in connection with your agents, Moody and Sankey, who are supposed to be in your special service, and who have just commenced a grand starring engagement through our principal cities, in your interest, I embrace the opportunity to address you in this manner, hoping I may be able to attract your attention and to receive a reply. I am in quest of truth, and many say it is to be found with you, and to attain any good gift whatsoever of you, it is only necessary to ask. I wish knowledge and information on many subjects, and I hereby make my wants known, I trust with due respect and in a proper spirit. If I have not troubled you latterly as often as many do, I hope it will not disparage my chances of recognition. If your memory serves you, you will bring to mind, that something over a quarter of a century ago, I was in the habit of addressing you regularly four or five times a day, from one year's end to another, but finally coming to the conclusion that my appeals were not heard, or that they availed me nothing, I discontinued them, thus saving much time and breath and losing nothing, so far as I was able to judge. After a silence of more than twenty-five years, it is hoped this effort will be successful; but if it is not, I shall not be greatly disappointed.

If you can make it convenient at intervals from duty, during these revival times, either during the present engagement of Moody and Sankey at the Skating Rink in Brooklyn, or at their coming engagement in January next, at the Hippodrome on Fourth avenue in this city, (formerly Barnum's Circus, and afterwards Gilmore's Concert Garden, and Shook & Palmer's Lager-beer Saloon,) or if at any other time, you can spare a few moments to communicate with me upon the subject matter of this letter, I hope I shall be duly grateful, and I assure you I will make good use of the information received.

I shall not have room in one letter to enquire of you all I wish to know, but if I am successful in obtaining answers to these questions, I may sometime address you again, but in any event, I trust I approach you in a proper spirit, and that I give no offence. I wish not to be impertinent, but to indicate to you the points upon which I need light. If you are truly the source of light, may I not hope to be successful?

In nearly all the lives and biographies that have been written of you, a great lack exists of a description of the days of your infancy, childhood and youth. How is it that the "Evangelists," who are said to have been divinely delegated to write your life and teachings, should have been so silent in reference to this interesting portion of your existence? Were these items purposely suppressed, or was it simply accidental?

There is a great uncertainty relative to the origin of your existence; the account we have seems to rest largely upon a dream which it is said your step-father dreamed. May I ask you, is that account reliable?

Were you begotten by the Creator of the Universe, and was he personally present on the occasion?

Were you begotten by the same process as all other beings have been, who have lived in this world, or was it out of the ordinary course of nature?

Was your mother psychologized or mesmerized, or otherwise rendered insensible, or did she retain her consciousness?

Did she acquiesce in the interesting procedure? Was she simply passive, or was she overcome by a force which she could not resist?

Did love have ought to do in the transaction? and if so, was it an example of "free-love?"

Did the occurrence cause any scandal in the neighborhood, and was it generally understood that your step-father had dreamed out the true theory?

If you are part God and part human, can you not properly be called a hybrid, an amalgamation or miscegenation?

Your friends, the clergy, assert that you existed as an individual from all eternity, and that your begetting and birth eighteen hundred and seventy-five years ago, was merely a formality for the purpose of endowing you with the quality of mortality. Is that so?

Did you, then, retain your consciousness during the nine months of your mother's gestation? If so, may I ask, did not close confinement for so long a period become somewhat irksome?

Had you full consciousness during the days of your infancy?

Was the star which was said to point out to the wise men who sought you in the stable in which you was born, a real star like others, millions of miles away, and which are immense bodies of matter, or was it a little star gotten up especially for the occasion, and which moved near the surface of the earth?

Was it so important that those men from the East should find you, while yet a new born babe, that a star was delegated to leave its course to point out to them your precise locality, or to get up another for that special purpose?

Do you remember the critical period of "cutting teeth"?

Was there any "Mrs. Winslow" in those days, to prepare "Soothing Syrup" for the babies?

Were you much troubled with colic, croup, bowel-complaint or worms?

At what age did you have the mumps, the measles and the whooping cough? Did you have them light or hard?

Did you used to wear petticoats when you were little, and can you remember your first pants?

Can you remember when you first used to run out doors and play with the boys and girls?

Did you know, when you was a little boy, that you was God, and the Ruler of the Universe?

Is it true as narrated in the New Testament, styled "Apocryphal," that when you were a small child and traveling with your mother, that she placed you on the back of a mule that, by enchantment, had been changed from a young man, and that you transformed him back to a young man again?

Is it true that you rolled up clay in the form of birds and then made them fly away in the air?

Did the water in which your mother had washed you, cure two sick children?

Did you cause a boy to die because he carelessly ran against you?

Did you use to go to school and did you like studying?

Did you learn rapidly?

Did you know all things from all time, including the ordinary branches of education taught in schools, or did you have to study and learn like other scholars? Did you ever play hookey?

Were you fond of boyish sports? Were marbles, "hop-sotch," leap-frog and base-ball in vogue at that time?

Did you ever fall in love with any girls of your age, and if so did anything serious come of it?

How old were you when you commenced working at the carpenters' trade?

Did you stretch boards, doors, etc., for your step-father when he made them too short?

How did you like the carpentering business?

If you were God and knew all things past, present and future, why did you not get up some such inventions as planing machines, morticing machines, matching machines, or circular saws, which for the last fifty years have proved themselves so valuable in saving labor?

Why did you not leave some such invention behind you to assist in immortalizing your name?

How came you to quit the carpenter business? Was it not a good trade at that time?

Did you like preaching and performing miracles better?

Have you ever doubted whether your first miracle, changing water into wine, at the wedding in Cana, was well advised, especially as the guests were already drunk?

Have you not many times, with sadness, noticed the bad effects of intemperance and the undue use of intoxicating drinks?

Have you ever thought that the miracle alluded to, was setting a bad example to wine-bibbers?

Did it ever occur to you that it was not strictly moral and not according to the commandments, to go into other peoples corn fields on the Sabbath and pluck corn, without permission?

Upon mature reflection, do you still think you were right and reasonable when you got angry at the fig tree and cursed it because it did not bear figs at an untimely season of the year?

Do you still think it kind and god-like to damn people to endless punishment because they do not believe that which they cannot believe?

Can a person believe just what he pleases, whether convinced or not?

Do you still think the example of mendicancy and idleness the best example you could have set your fellow men?

Is not the doctrine "take no thought for the morrow," calculated to prevent enterprise thrift and forethought? Would we have anything to eat in winter, if we did not prepare for it in summer?

Was it strictly right for you to instruct your disciples to take an ass or a mule to which they had no right?

When you went without food for forty days, in the wilderness, did you not endanger your life? Can a man now go forty days without food or drink, and live?

When the Devil took you up into a very high mountain and showed you all the kingdoms of the earth, did he carry you as boys say, "pig-back," or in what way did he carry you?

How high was the mountain?

Could you see the countries on the opposite side of the globe any better for going on to a high mountain?

Did you get a good view of Rhode Island and New Jersey?

Did you at that time know the earth is a round ball, or did the person know it who wrote the account?

Did you know at the time you were accompanying the Devil on this mountain trip, that he was your deadliest foe, as well as the great enemy of the human race?

When you were riding on his back through the air, why did you not embrace the opportunity and choke the villain to death?

Would it not have been the greatest favor you possibly could have conferred upon the human race?

Would it not have been vastly better than to be yourself put to death?

Did it please your loving Father better that you should die, than his old enemy and creature, the Devil?

Did your blood pacify his disturbed feelings better than the Devil's would?

Does blood actually appease your Father's anger?

Did not the blood of bullocks, rams and he-goats, formerly have that effect?

Does he not still have a fondness for blood?

Were the chemical constituents of your blood materially different from other men's, that it could exert a more potent effect upon the anger of your Father?

If it was either through the plan of your Father, or through the intrigues of the Devil that you were put to death, was there not partiality and injustice in the business?

Did it do your Father any good, or the Devil any harm, for you to die?

Would it not have been better for your Father, for yourself and for the whole world, if the Devil could have been the one to be put to death and then had remained dead?

What was the Devil ever made for?

Was it not the greatest mistake, the greatest folly that was ever committed?

Had there been no Devil, would not everything have been lovely with everybody, and would there have been any one to vex your Father?

Does not the Devil get fully nine-tenths of the whole human family, and does he not annoy your Father and yourself more than all the world besides?

Why is it you still suffer him to live?

Is it because you need him to officiate as Chief-Burner-General in the nether regions of brimstone, and to carry out your will in pitching and punching and burning poor hapless beings to the latest moments of eternity, and who had no hand in bringing themselves into existence or in getting up the vile natures with which they are endowed?

Is there not really a tacit, secret understanding—a partnership in fact—between the Devil, your Father and yourself?

Does not the Devil carry out the wishes of your Father and yourself, in punishing and tormenting his helpless victims?

Would your grand scheme of salvation be worth anything without the Devil?

Is not the Devil in the divine programme a personage equally as important as your father or yourself?

Could you get along without a devil?

Would the system of theology which we have in this country, and which is attributed to you, be worth a row of pins without a devil in it?

Could your sixty thousand clergymen in this country get along without a devil?

Would their business pay running expenses except for a devil to warm it up?

Really, after all, considering how much the Devil has done towards carrying out the divine plan concocted by your father and yourself; how much he has done for the human race by introducing education, science, inventions, innovations, and Freethought, while your clergymen and your church have been doing all they could to keep them out, is he not after all, a pretty good fellow?

Is he really as cruel and relentless as the clergy represent him?

Is it your Father or the Devil that is the most revengeful and unforgiving?

Let me ask you, can you be happy in heaven, seated on the throne, at the right hand of your Father, the four beasts near, with the hundred and forty-four thousand saints dressed in white robes, bowing continually and singing the song of Moses and the Lamb, that song which no other man can learn; I ask, can you be happy thus, while you know the poor, wretched, unfortunate damned are writhing and screaming in the torments of hell?

Do not the shrieks of the damned wretches sometimes penetrate even to your throne and overpower, for the moment, that continuous song of Moses & Co.?

Can you be completely happy thus surrounded, when you know countless millions of poor, weak creatures are suffering the most excruciating tortures?

Would it not be vastly better to suffer those pitiful wretches to go out of existence than to keep them in endless torment?

What possible good can it do your Father, yourself or any living being to punish eternally quintillions of poor fallible men and women?

Is there no possibility of ending this most wretched and damnable business?

To return; when the Devil took you up into that high mountain, to show you all the kingdoms of the earth, and when he offered them to you, did you not know he had no title to them at all, and that they belonged to the estate of your Father?

If you knew this, was it much of a virtue in you that you did not accept his offer?

Do you think it was a sharp thing in the Devil to undertake to play such a game with a God?

Was not the Devil, who could transport you on to the top of a high mountain, equally as large and as strong as yourself?

Was he the same Devil, or the same sized Devil that you subsequently cast out of the wild man you found raving among the tombs?

If that was a full-sized Devil, how could he get into a man?

Mark says the Devil left the man and went into two thousand swine; were there two thousand Devils in the man, or did the one Devil divide up into two thousand parts?

When the two thousand swine rushed down a steep place in the sea and were drowned, what became of the Devils? Were they drowned, or did they enter the fishes?

Mark says all these Devils were in one man, and Matthew says there were two men that had the Devils, which was correct? Did Matthew see double?

If one told the truth, did not the other tell a falsehood?

If you sent those Devils into two thousand hogs, thus causing their destruction, is it strange that the people, when they learned the fact, wished you to leave their coast?

Would any of our Western stock-growers welcome your visit now, if you should thus cause the destruction of their herds?

Were those Devils that you sent into the swine the same kind as the seven Devils which you extracted from Mary Magdalene?

What was the size of those seven Devils? Where did they enter, and where did they make their exit?

Is not all this business devilish strange, any way?

If your death was necessary to the happiness of the world, to the serenity and peace of your Father's mind; if you had to die, that one in ten, or one in a hundred of poor doomed humanity might escape the suffering vouchsafed to all the rest, and by which grand process your Father is to be eternally glorified, did not Judas play a most commendable part?

If you had to be betrayed before you could be tried and crucified, was not the betrayal most essential?

If this is so, is it not wrong to despise Judas and hold him in detestation for the important work he performed?

Should he not rather be canonized by your Church as a saint of the first water?

How could a single being ever have found salvation, had there been no Judas?

Were not the Jewish priests who urged on your death and destruction, also important factors in the grand, divine scheme?

Were not the Roman soldiers who performed the closing part of the melo-drama, also worthy of special honor and distinction?

If you knew the results of your death, in redeeming a few sinned souls from the burning sea of sulphur, were of such vast importance, why did you dread the special work you came to perform—the glorious death you came to die?

Was there ought of fear or faltering in your mind and courage when you so frantically reproached your Father, for forsaking you?

Did you really think he had turned his back upon you, when you cried out so piteously, "Eloi, eloi, lama sabachthani?"

Do you think you met death as bravely as did old Socrates and numerous others of those old heroes who preceded you?

Should a God, in facing death, have less courage, less fortitude, and less backbone than a man?

Did you know that your death would be the most glorious event in the whole history of the world?

Did you consider it any more for you to die than for any other individual to pass through the same ordeal?

Have not hundreds of thousands of men and women endured the pains of dissolution with far more fortitude than you did, though their sufferings were many times greater?

Let me ask you was the six hours during which you was suspended on the cross sufficient to take a man's life?

Did you absolutely die, or was it merely a case of fainting or swooning?

Did darkness cover the earth in consequence of your suspension upon the cross? Where was the sun during those three hours?

Was an earthquake also produced in consequence of your sufferings, and did the graves open and the dead walk out alive and mix again with their former companions?

If this extraordinary affair really occurred, why was Matthew the only one of your biographers to notice it, when mere trivial events were minutely related by all?

Did you keep the engagement you made at that time with the thief, that he should be that day with you in paradise?

Did you not, rather, take the opposite direction and spend the interim between your death and resurrection in the heart of the earth, according to your prediction, or "in hell," as the Apostles Creed and the Bible have it?

Did you not find the interior of the earth intensely hot and a very uncomfortable place to be in?

If you were to pass three days in the heart of the earth did it not necessitate your traveling four thousand miles through dense, super-heated matter to get there?

Did you not find the great density towards the heart of the earth a great impediment to your travel?

If it was foretold by yourself and others that you should be three days in the heart of the earth how could you make two nights and one day to fill the bill?

Are one day and two nights—aggregating at the most forty-eight hours—equal to three days or seventy-two hours?

Had the extreme heat of the interior of the earth anything to do with your returning before your time was up?

Did you not make excellent time to go four thousand miles to the heart of the earth and return in two nights and a day? Did you have much time to tarry there?

Let me ask you as to your ascension; did your physical body, the same that was laid in the sepulchre, ascend?

How high did your journey reach?

Did you not find the upper air extremely rare and intensely cold?

Can a physical body of flesh and blood exist for ten minutes at a distance of ten miles from the earth?

As the earth travels through space at a velocity of over sixty-eight thousand miles an hour, does that fact make any difference as to the direction, route or distance from earth to heaven?

How is it that the four evangelists differ so widely in reference to your ascension, Matthew representing that you ascended from a mountain in Galilee, Mark

The Marples-Underwood Debate, at Toronto, Ontario.

From the Toronto National.

We publish this week a lengthy report of the public four evenings' debate between Rev. John Marples and Mr. B. F. Underwood upon the questions of the existence of a Personal God and the Inspiration of the Bible, which took place in this city last week (the first part of Oct.). The affair was fully as successful and interesting as was anticipated. The orthodox element was not as largely represented in the audience as would have been desirable, owing, doubtless, to the policy which a considerable number of Christians deem it advisable to pursue, of ignoring such gatherings altogether, on the ground that such questions should not be discussed. In strong contrast to this rather narrow-minded view, we must mention the part taken in the affair by several prominent clergymen, three of whom Rev'ds. J. G. Robb, D. J. Macdonell, and T. W. Jeffrey occupied the chair in the course of the discussion, endorsing, both by their presence and their utterances, the great principle of free and unfettered opinion as the first essential toward the attainment of truth. It may be deemed invidious to particularize, but we were especially gratified by the remarks made by the Rev. D. J. Macdonell, expressive of his intelligent sympathy with the position of Free Thinkers and sceptics. We are sure that many of our readers will be glad to learn that a debate between him and Mr. Underwood is now under consideration, and, if the details can be satisfactorily arranged, is likely to take place during the coming winter.

FIRST EVENING.

The public debate between the Rev. John Marples, Presbyterian minister of Toronto, and Mr. B. F. Underwood, Free Thought lecturer of Boston, which has for some time been anticipated by the adherents of the respective causes with considerable interest, commenced on the evening of the 29th ult. at the Temperance Hall. There was an audience of about three hundred persons in attendance in spite of the unfavorable weather, among whom were a number of ladies, and several ministers belonging to the leading orthodox denominations. The gathering was a highly respectable and intelligent one, and as far as could be judged, nearly equally divided in its proclivities with a slight majority of the friends of Free Thought. Mr. G. M. Rose occupied the chair, and in a brief and appropriate speech introduced the champion of Christianity.

Rev. John Marples explained the circumstances which gave rise to the Napanee debate, and the subsequent arrangement for a similar discussion here on the same questions. He stated the first proposition to be debated, as follows: "That Atheism, Materialism, and Modern Scepticism are illogical and contrary to reason." He occupied a considerable portion of his opening speech in defining the terms employed. Atheism he said was a disbelief in the existence of a God. Materialism was the assertion that there was nothing but matter in the Universe, and Scepticism was universal doubt. He defined truth as a knowledge of the real nature of things. Truths were of three kinds, physical, mathematical, and moral. The mistake made by Freethinkers was the application of physical or mathematical tests to subjects which could only be rightly judged by a moral standard. He knew a man named Dodworth in Sheffield, England, who was a leading Atheist, who used to argue that if God existed, men could see, hear, or feel him, and have tangible evidence of his existence. God being not matter but spirit, we could not expect to recognize him by the same faculties as if he were material. Bishop Colenso was an eminent mathematician, but his mathematics had run away with him, and he undertook to apply his measuring rule to the Bible, which could only be judged by a moral test. Herbert Spencer's view was, that induction and analysis should be regarded as sciences. The courts of law were accustomed to decide in accordance with the preponderance of evidence. All human transactions were governed by the same rule. Any position established by preponderance of evidence is considered established in logic. And he claimed that the existence of a personal God could so be established. The speaker then advanced the well-known argument of design, quoting from Voltaire to the effect that as a watch proved a watch-maker, so the Universe proved a creating God. Matter must either be eternal, self-caused or created, and it was impossible to prove either of the first two propositions.

Mr. B. F. Underwood accepted most of Mr. Marples' definitions as correct in the main. He took exception to the distinction drawn between different kinds of truth as purely arbitrary. Truth was one and indivisible—all truths must harmonize with others. Logicians have made these differences—they are not inherent in nature. The Atheist Dodworth referred to by his opponent was not a representative man. He (Underwood) did not disbelieve in a personal God because he could not see or feel him, but because he had no evidence of his existence. Colenso did apply the moral standard to the Pentateuch. He had examined it by the rules of enlightened virtue and found it wanting. The speaker then adduced the slaughter of the Midianites as recorded in Numb. xxxi: 13-18, as evidence of the atrocious nature of the actions of the ancient Jews, said to have been committed in accordance with the direct command of God. Could his opponent endorse the slaughter of women and children in cold blood as a justifiable act? He repudiated all authorities except as aids and assistants. He was not absolutely bound by any man's opinion. So far as preponderance of evidence was concerned, two witnesses might overbalance twelve. The design argument was a mere begging of the question. It was as if a man, seeing a woodchuck's hole and knowing it to have been produced by a woodchuck, should infer that the Hoosac tunnel was the work of some gigantic animal of the same species. (Laughter.) Analogy failed when stretched from heaven to earth. There was reason to believe in a watchmaker upon seeing a watch, because we had seen watches made. But we had not the same reason for inferring the existence of a worldmaker. Design implies finiteness, calculation, doubt, inconsistent with the character of an Infinite Being. "Man designs; Nature is." Matter was eternal. It was indestructible, and there could be no infinity with one end cut off. We could have no idea of anything we had not seen. We could not conceive of abstract qualities separately from the substances or persons through which they found expression. The speaker concluded by arguing that the amount of suffering in the world, and the universal system of warfare prevailing throughout nature, negated the idea of a beneficent and omnipotent Deity.

Mr. Marples, in reply, urged that the passage in Numbers would not bear the interpretation put upon it by his opponent. He read the preceding passage (Numbers xxv. 1-8), as evidence that the crimes of the Midianites deserved punishment, and justified the wholesale slaughter inflicted by command of Moses. God was the author of life, and had the right to dispose of it as he thought proper.

Mr. Underwood, in his closing speech, denied that he always required to see before he could accept conclusions deduced from scientific research. It was not supposable that all the Midianites were guilty of the offenses put forward as an excuse for wholesale massacre. He regarded the Bible as he did any other book, accepting what was reasonable, and rejecting such parts as were abhorrent to humanity and decency. He advanced the theory of evolution, claiming that the adaptation urged as a proof of design was caused by the survival of the fittest.

The best feeling prevailed during the debate, the speakers being courteous and gentlemanly in their conduct toward each other. The debate will be renewed this evening at the same place, Rev. J. G. Robb acting as chairman.

SECOND EVENING.

The debate was resumed on Thursday evening, at Temperance Hall, before a fair attendance. Rev. J. Gardner Robb presided.

Rev. John Marples, in resuming the discussion, said that his opponent placed design and adaptation in opposition, but as a matter of fact, adaptation was practical design. Design signified purpose, plan, scheme. Everything in Nature was wonderfully adapted to the purpose it fulfilled. What was the object of the firmament? Was it not to afford an arena through which countless mighty and brilliant orbs might roll ceaselessly on their course? The object with which the sun was created was to afford light and heat. It was in every respect adapted to the purpose of its creation. The forces of gravity—the centripetal and centrifugal forces were adapted to their task in keeping the planets in their orbits. Suppose that the centrifugal force were suddenly suspended; the planets would suddenly hurl themselves upon the centre, and universal destruction would result amid "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds." Earth was perfectly adapted to be the abode of man. The wonderful mechanism of the human body was admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was formed. Nature was perfect. Art, when striving after perfection, was obliged to imitate Nature. Nothing like the order and fitness witnessed throughout the Universe could be caused by chance. We might as well throw a quantity of type into the air and expect it to come down arranged as a poem by chance. His opponent apparently fancied that the world was created on that principle. No life could be spontaneously generated. In order for the production of life, two things were necessary—seed and favorable conditions for its nurture. He quoted from a criticism on Tyndall contained in the London Globe, to the effect that as an egg contained all the germs of life, but could not be developed without heat, so the "promise and potency of every form of life" which Tyndall recognized in inert matter needed something from without to vivify it.

Mr. Underwood recommended to his opponent's consideration, the doctrine of the conservation of force. If he expended so much physical energy, it would detract from his mental power. Adaptation was not necessarily an evidence of design, because according to the orthodox argument, adaptation could be proved to have existed from eternity. Order, harmony, and adaptation must exist in the creator, and if they are evidences of design, it is clear that he in his turn must have been created, and so an infinite succession of Gods can be inferred which reduces the design argument to a reductio ad absurdum. He acknowledged the existence of an unknown and unknowable power; but to call that power "God" was merely to clothe our ignorance with a word. Personality was inconsistent with infinity. Personality implied self-hood, limitation and form. Form implied formation, and as a consequence, beginning. Intelligence infers finiteness. There could be no such thing as infinite intelligence. The speaker contended that the qualities which constituted intelligence, such as reason, imagination, &c., were inconsistent with infinite knowledge. Reason implied a conclusion arrived at—an increase to our stock of knowledge. Imagination dealt with the realm of the unseen, therefore, if God possessed imagination, there must be something he could not see. Nations made their Gods after themselves. The African gods were black, the Indian deities red, &c.

Mr. Marples speaking of the possibility of the destruction of the centrifugal force, showed himself ignorant of the doctrine of the correlation of forces. No force could be destroyed. Adaptation was the result of development. The earth passed through innumerable changes, and as its condition improved higher and higher forms of life appeared. Art had improved on nature. Animals and vegetables were wonderfully improved by breeding and cultivation. He read an extract from Schmidt, a recent German author, to show that some of the lower forms of life were propagated without the process of generation, by a process of disintegration, and closed by a quotation from Tyndall's celebrated Belfast address.

Mr. Marples claimed that Tyndall established his position, that seed was necessary for the organization of life. The infertility of hybrids was fatal to the development theory. Prof. Huxley had stated that it was not proven that a species ever originated by natural selection. We spoke of God as though he had human attributes and parts, but it was a mere figure of rhetoric. All things must have had an intelligent creator; but God was a being self-existent, uncreated and eternal.

Mr. Underwood argued that fitness and adaptability arose from the struggle for existence. Those animals whose color was nearest to that of their surroundings could most easily escape their pursuers, and hence survived, and their peculiarities were perpetuated. The hardiest plants of any variety survived in a cold climate, while the weaker ones died out and the species became gradually adapted to its environments. Huxley has said, that the Darwinian theory could not be absolutely demonstrated, still he regarded it as most probable. Water adapted itself to its bed, and gradually wore a channel for itself, but without any special purpose in view. The speaker then concluded by referring to the various natural convulsions, pestilences, storms, fires, wars and famines, and asked if the system of Nature and the condition of man was consistent with the theory of a God of love and power. Infinite Power could prevent suffering—infinite Love would.

THIRD EVENING.

The second portion of the debate was taken up on Friday evening, the subject being the Inspiration of the Scriptures. There was a good attendance, considering the number of other gatherings. Rev. D. J. Macdonnell occupied the chair.

Mr. Marples stated the question to be discussed as follows: "That the Bible, consisting of the O. T. and the New Testaments, contains evidence beyond all other books of its divine origin." He stated that he did not believe in the inspiration of the English version, nor did he contend that every word of the original was inspired. The three principal evidences for inspiration were the fulfilment of prophecy, miracles, and the effect of Christianity on mankind. There were in the Old Testament no less than thirty-eight predictions with respect to the coming of Christ, some of which were uttered four thousand years, and none less than four hundred years, before his appearance. The destruction of Jerusalem was prophesied one thousand years before the prediction was fulfilled. Christ also foretold its annihilation in plain and unmistakable terms. There were other remarkable prophecies uttered concerning the desolation of Egypt. It was prophesied by Ezekiel that Egypt should be delivered into the hands of strangers; that there should be "no more a Prince in the land of Egypt." Volney in his travels testified to the degraded condition of the country. Isaiah had foretold that Edom or Idumea should lie waste. Volney speaks of thirty ruined towns in that country, of its being the habitation of wild beasts and the abode of desolation, according to the prediction of the sacred volume. Burkhardt says, the country is a desert. The speaker closed by commenting upon the close and literal fulfilment of all the predictions concerning Christ.

Mr. Underwood said there might be a preponderance of evidence concerning a subject of which we had sufficient data leaning to one side, but not enough to completely establish it. He contended, that had God intended to give man a revelation, he would never have put it in a dead language, rendering the ipse dixit of the clergy necessary to its correct interpretation; but that he would have written it upon the face of Nature in characters of living light, or more probably, impressed it upon the mind and heart of man. Mr. Marples did not believe that every word of the Bible was inspired. Others might say the same concerning other passages, and who was to judge? The latest manuscripts discovered all differed from each other, and from the generally received version of the Scriptures, which had been forged to build up certain dogmas. The prophecies lacked circumstantiality and particularity of statement. He doubted whether Christ's prophecy concerning Jerusalem was uttered before the event. There was no evidence that any one of the gospels was written in the first century. The end of the world was foretold in the Bible, as being then immediately at hand. Of the blessings and curses pronounced with regard to the Jewish nation in Deuteronomy xxviii, some had been fulfilled and some had not. He quoted a prophecy concerning Egypt which had not been fulfilled, and claimed that his opponent should have furnished chapter and verse of the prophecies relating to the Messiah. Instead of bringing peace on earth according to the prediction, the Gospel has brought wars and dissensions. He concluded by pointing out the difference between Christ and the temporal ruler expected by the Jews.

Mr. Marples said that on the next evening he would go into the predictions concerning Christ, and challenged his opponent to bring forward thirty-eight passages in any other so-called sacred book concerning any other person which had been fulfilled. He said that all the prophecies had come through the descendants of Shem. No revelations had been vouchsafed through Ham. In reply to Mr. Underwood's argument with regard to the language in which the Bible was written, he said this difficulty was traceable to the tower of Babel, where the Lord confounded the language of the audacious builders.

Mr. Underwood said that Mr. Marples had not replied to many of the arguments that he had advanced. He characterized the laws of the Bible as disgraceful to savages and said that the Jews were a barbarous and an ignorant people. The well-known prophecy of Mother Shipton had been fulfilled to the letter, excepting the last item. He did not believe in the story of the tower of Babel and the confusion of tongues, which was against the views of the most eminent philologists.

The Rev. D. J. Macdonnell, in summing up, said, that the debate was calculated to do good, and result in a firmer hold and deeper love of Truth. There were many people in all the Churches who could understand and sympathize with much of Mr. Underwood's position, while repudiating his conclusions. Many members of the Churches were looking not so much for Truth, as for their particular "ism," and the same remark applied to many professed Liberals also. They wished to establish preconceived ideas of their own. Statements had been made, as matters of fact, which amazed him and set him thinking; and he would probably take the opportunity of expressing his views on these subjects at an early day.

FOURTH EVENING.

The debate on the inspiration of the scriptures was concluded on Saturday, Rev. Mr. Jeffrey presiding. As on the previous evenings the majority of the audience appeared to be in sympathy with the views of the advocate of Free Thought.

Rev. Mr. Marples took up the argument of the fulfillment of prophecies concerning the coming of the Messiah. He was referred to in the Old Testament as the seed of the woman who should bruise the head of the serpent—as Shiloh—as a great prophet—he was to be of the tribe of Judah of the house of David—to be born in Bethlehem—to be born of a virgin—to be remarkable for his wisdom, righteousness and meekness—to work miracles—to be despised and rejected of men—a man of sorrows—to be betrayed for thirty pieces of silver—to be tried, condemned, spit upon, pierced with a spear, and put to death—to be buried in a rich man's tomb, and finally to ascend on high, leading captivity captive—his teachings were to extend far and wide, and enlighten the Gentiles. He gave the chapter and verse for several of these passages. His opponent would perhaps contend, that Mary was not of the seed of David. There were two genealogies of Christ given in the Bible—tracing his descent from David. That given by Matthew gave the paternal line through Joseph—the other was to be found in Luke and gave the descent of his mother Mary. The latter stated that Joseph was the son of Heli—meaning son-in-law—Heli being the father of Mary. According to the Jewish system of genealogy, the name of the husband was put for that of the wife.

The speaker read an extract from the writings of John Stuart Mill, in which a high tribute is paid to the character of Christ as a standard of divine excellence. Concluding with the sentence, "Whatever else may be taken away from us by rational criticism, Christ is still left."

Mr. Underwood said he had asked his opponent for chapter and verse of the prophecies referred to by him, but Mr. Marples had only given them in three instances which, he must conclude, were the strongest he could adduce to prove the fulfillment of prophecy. The passage relating to the bruising of the head of the serpent by the seed of the woman, had no reference to Christ—merely to the killing in the readiest way of serpents by men, in consequence of the idea that the serpent had tempted Eve. In the seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed was another text adduced. All the nations were not blessed in the seed of Abraham. Christianity was making no progress in the East. "The scepter shall not depart from Judah until Shiloh come" could not refer to Christ, as Judah was a subjugated province at the period of his advent. The text of Isaiah, "behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son," was a sign given to King Ahaz respecting his deliverance from his enemies. The context would show that the event referred to is mentioned by Isaiah as happening shortly afterwards. The same argument adduced to prove the divinity of Christ, would establish that of Buddha—another great moral teacher and law-giver. He agreed with Mill in his veneration for the character of Christ as a reformer and iconoclast, who, were he to reappear on earth to-day, would affiliate as of old, with the abused, the down trodden and the outcasts, and would find a readier acceptance in the halls of the Infidels, than beneath the gilded steeples of a formal Christianity. (Applause.) Rev. Dr. McNaught, of Liverpool, and Dean Alford were both opposed to the view that Mary came of the House of David. As to the effect of Christianity, the doctrine of the atonement was demoralizing in its character as affording a cover for every kind of vice. The great bankrupt scheme of salvation made men more careful about getting converted, than anxious to live true and noble lives. The speaker commented upon the absurdity of a system which, while receiving those whose lives had been a course of depravity, because they professed repentance at the last, held that Mill, Humboldt, and other benefactors of the race were damned because they did not believe. Such an undue exaltation of faith, gave a license to crime and wherever it was preached the jails were filled with criminals.

Mr. Marples in reply said that the countries blessed with an open Bible compared favorably with others. The well-known Joseph Barker, once an Atheist, had given damaging testimony as to the immoral lives of the Infidels he met in the States. He contended that he was entitled to be considered the victor as Mr. Underwood had not even attempted to show that any other book afforded equal marks of divine inspiration to the Bible.

Mr. Underwood claimed that, according to the rules of debate, he could not be expected to prove a negative. It was true that the Bible-reading countries were the most advanced, but that was because the prevailing intelligence induced the people to become acquainted with literature in general. He might with equal truth say that the countries where the Greek and Roman classics were most studied were most advanced. He pointed to the low condition of Abyssinia, which had been Christian for fifteen hundred years. England had increased in greatness in proportion as she had grown skeptical. He alluded to the progress of Free Thought in the States, in Germany, &c, and said that Joseph Barker was an unscrupulous adventurer—Christian or Atheist by turns as suited his purpose. Christianity had no doubt been a factor for good in human progress, but it had outgrown its usefulness, was unsuited to the age, and a clog on the wheels of progress.

The speaker closed the discussion amid loud applause by expressing his satisfaction with the treatment he had received in Toronto, and his friendly feeling towards his opponent.

Mr. Marples, in a few appropriate words, reciprocated the expressions of good will on the part of Mr. Underwood, and assured him of his continued esteem and friendship.

The chairman was exceedingly glad the discussion had taken place. It would awaken thought, and lead to closer investigation of the basis of religion. The great want of the age was not so much the want of brains as a want of thought.

After the passage of a vote of thanks to the chair and general committee, the meeting adjourned.

The Poor this Winter.

To Peter Cooper and Hon. Abram S. Hewitt:

FRIENDS: The Fall River complication having brought home to the laboring poor of New York the question of their own imminent extremity, the question how at least scores of thousands of them are to look freezing and starvation in the face this Winter, how could you refuse the hall of the Cooper Union to the Labor Lyceum for a lecture from Charles Bradlaugh, a man with such an inevitable future before him as no other man in England, yet to be the first man in the United Kingdom, destined to enter Parliament and convert and compel it to justice to himself and his plebeian party, and who, as if his stake was not that sea-girt Empire but the whole world, yearly vaults to these shores to conquer fame and position here, welcomed, honored and sped by such men as Sumner, Phillips and Emerson? How could you refuse the hall to these thousands of suffering, imploring, destitute, despairing laboring poor? When Peter Cooper, a penniless lad, grew to erect and donate for the benefit of the similarly destitute, that magnificent structure devoted to science and art, with its reading-rooms, schools of design, and numberless benefactions open to all, alas! alas! was this last act to turn his back on all that proud and noble career?—J. T., in N. Y. Star.

Labor Strikes.

BY A. GAYLORD SPALDING.

DEAR EDITOR: We know the universal antagonism of labor and capital, which explains all labor strikes everywhere. Wise or otherwise, they are always justifiable or excusable, and will continue, in the nature of things, until justice and equity shall harmonize the relations of men and classes—employers and employees. Labor has the first claim, that can never be yielded nor relinquished, since life itself is only sustained by labor.

The negro chattel had rights, founded in human nature, and the rebellion was his strike—most terribly bloody, to be sure, but the last resort. In earth or heaven who can ever blame or condemn him? It was the crack of doom to hoary injustice, cruelty and tyranny, and should have been far extended, heeded, and applied. But mankind are slow to learn.

The Grange is now a grand and extensive strike of the white man, as well black. We avoid the blood, but mean none the less. It is a claim for justice and equal rights for the farmers and producers, against non-producers and vampires. Parties and sects are ignored. It is a question of manhood and labor, against money and non-labor, or aristocracy. We inaugurate a new order of aristocracy, namely, the

ARISTOCRACY OF LABOR.

Man is man, and who is more? Not even President Grant, Henry Ward Beecher, nor the Pope of Rome. Men have their pets and idols of party and sect, but the Grange favors none of them. Come down, come down, we say to the lofty and lordly millionaires, and the hundred thousand and fifty thousand dollar preachers and office-holders. No matter under what name or head you put it—Church, Ministry, Bible, Religion, or Politics—it is all one thing to the Granger. Come down to the farmer's half bushel. Ever so big or high, you all have to eat the same bread with us, and we produce it. It is common labor, common right, common humanity.

No privileged class, of church, clergy, or profession, of any kind, because the farmer claims equal manhood, and such partiality crushes him down in the dust. You may boast of your Websters, Calhouns, or Ben. Butlers; but the essence of all law, even the seedy and swarthy farmer can understand, and save the fees, though his speech be not reported in the morning paper. You may be proud of your Beechers, Spurgeons, and Moodys; but the substance of all true practical religion the plainest and humblest worker may fully comprehend, without making any man an idol, pope, or god, for an easy and genteel profession. Such distinction ruins the best society, like the old caste system of India.

THE STRIKE.

All superfluous offices, legislation, and burdens of old custom or habit, in the past, we throw off and abolish, because thereby labor is taxed, shackled, and crushed. It is a strike; and we strike in various ways: by speech, oral or written, by the newspaper, and by the ballot. Let the shining and heroic TRUTH SEEKER strike. It does strike, with hitting and cutting licks. Never fear to speak the bold and saving truth. Speech is our greatest weapon and power. Speak, sing, write, print, the burning and blistering truth. "He that would be free, himself must strike the blow." We may make a bloody strike, but there are wiser methods. Ballot is better than bullet. But the best strike of all, is CO-OPERATION.

Strike, printers; strike, mechanics; strike, farmers; strike, miners of Pennsylvania, in the dark coal-beds. Strike, workers of New York, and of all the broad continent. Strike the saloons, the loafers, the shirks, the deadheads, the politicians, the aristocrats. Strike down Tyranny and Monopoly; strike up Brotherhood and Equality. Strike for the Millennium. Strike!

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

is a noble and glorious strike; and the success of the Grange is the success of that, because it is a Grange principle, and fundamental. The Grange Movement is national, not sectional, and therefore, when women vote, in California and Minnesota, they will do the same in New York and New England. Millions of Grangers will be millions for woman's ballot. Then keep it before the people. East, West, North, or South the cause is one, everywhere. Strike!

with us, is a multiplicity, a combination, and a complication, and may be compared to a newspaper, the people being the types and self-compositors; or, to a mixed, cunning and intricate web, with the people for warp and woof, and self-weaving. Oh, such a nice, curious, beautiful, harmonious, perfect, and happy system! All right, indeed, for the millennium—only, were ont the diabolical abuses and abominations. But our Grants, Beechers, and Generalissimos of State and Church, incline to stand outside, a peg or two above the people, to boss, assume, and monopolize the whole job, and lay on the taxes. However, the Grange says, strike! We will mark and correct the foul, black, proof-sheet, and pick out the knotted and tangled threads. Strike! We all are labor strikers, to kill monopoly stone dead. Strike, in November, like a thunderbolt. "One shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight." Strike!

stating that the ascension took place in a room where the eleven were at meat, Luke having it that you led your disciples out to Bethany, where you made your ascension, while John says nothing about your going up at all?

How could such an important event in your career be so differently stated by the four?

If either was right, were not the others wrong?

Has the great similarity between many characters in the heathen mythologies and your own, ever attracted your attention?

Are you not aware that the main facts, or what are claimed as facts, in your history appear to have been copied from similar legends pertaining to pre-existing individuals?

Were not Buddha, Christna, Sakia, Zulis, Bacchus, Hercules, Alcides, Hesus and several others who lived, or were claimed to have lived, hundreds of years before, said to have been born of virgins and to have a god for a father?

Was it not said of many of them, that they had disciples, to whom they taught excellent morals, and before whom they performed wonderful miracles?

Were not Christna, Sakia, Thammuz, Wirtoba, Iao, Hesus, Quexalcote, Quirinus, Prometheus, Thulis, Indra, Alcestos, Atys, Crite, Bali, Mithra and still others, all of whom lived centuries before your time, claimed to have been crucified as expiations for the sins of the world?

If your life and death upon the earth were a divine plan, devised in heaven, is it not a little singular that it should be so perfect a pattern after so many similar schemes previously gotten up by pagan nations?

Is God under the necessity of borrowing his plans from barbarians and ignorant heathens?

Is not the striking similarities between the various mythologies the world has known, enough to cause any thinking person to believe each system was borrowed from another?

As Christianity was the youngest mythology of the lot, does it not seem probable that it is wholly a plagiarism?

When you uttered your best and grandest sentiments and morals did you not know that the same had been uttered by many, hundreds of years earlier?

Do you not know it now?

Do you not know that what is called the "Golden Rule," was written much earlier and taught by Confucius, Pittacus, Socrates, Sextus, Isocrates, Hillel and others?

Did you give any of these persons credit for any of the sentiments borrowed from them?

Were not the sentiments and morals taught by these old pagans, when the same as yours, equally as worthy of veneration and praise as when uttered by yourself?

Had not nearly every moral sentiment which was attributed to you been taught by others before you?

Is any given maxim or truth more true, or more beautiful for being spoken by a God or a demi-god?

Is not the same maxim when pronounced by a man just as true and as admirable as when from a God?

Is it just to transfer to any individual the credit and honor that has been earned by another?

Would it not be just as right that we should revere and honor Confucius, Pythagoras, Plato, and others for the excellent morals they have taught, as to give you all the praise for inculcating the same?

Is it strange that in view of the great similarity between your life and teachings and those of your predecessors, that many should doubt the probability of your existence?

Is it not a fact that all the rites, ceremonies, sacraments and usages of the creed called by your name are traceable directly back to pre-existent heathenism?

If this is true can there be any harm in the world being apprised of it?

If Christianity in the dark ages of the world has served a purpose and assisted somewhat in helping man to emerge from the mists, falsities and superstitions of the primitive ages, does it follow that he should always continue to hug it to his bosom as truth?

In fact, is it not time the world discarded all mythologies, man-made gods, mental crudities, absurdities, monstrosities, falsities, senseless creeds, superstitions and impositions?

Are not Truth, Science, Reason, Fraternal Love and Human Brotherhood vastly superior to all these?

Have not many of the propagandists of your religion been most bloody tyrants?

Was not Constantine, who murdered many of his own family, of this number?

Were not Charlemagne, Guy Lusignan, Torquemada, Alva, Philip II., John Calvin, Munzer, Claverhouse and very many others of the same category?

Has not the religion called after your name caused more bloodshed, more persecution, and more suffering than all the other religions of the world?

When the terrible slaughters, massacres and murders that have been committed in your name and in your cause, came to your knowledge, why did you not sometimes interpose and prevent those abominations?

Did you approve of the infernal institution called the "Holy Inquisition" which for five hundred years cursed the most populous portions of Europe, and before which hellish court were dragged at all hours of day and night, men and women, helpless, defenceless victims of priestly suspicion, avarice and malice, and where without evidence or means of defence they were slowly and cruelly tortured on racks, wheels and infernal machines of every possible conception, and where hot pinchers, pullies, thumb-screws, and the stake and fagot were used in thousands of instances?

Could you hear the cries and groans of these poor, helpless, tortured wretches, hour after hour, day after day, month after month, year after year, century after century, and never feel a particle of sympathy for the sufferers—and never stretch forth your hand or to lift a finger to stay these most accursed wrongs?

Did you participate in the wars of the Crusades, when Christian Europe sent so many of her hardest and bravest sons to wrest the Holy Land from the possession of the Infidel, which terrible wars lasted many years, and which caused the blood of scores of millions of human beings to saturate the earth?

Did you take part in other Christian wars by which unknown thousands and millions of hapless mortals were made to bite the dust?

Did you assist in the bloody persecutions which continued for centuries, that were directed against the sincere, well-disposed, but most unfortunate Vaudois, Waldenses, Albigenses, the Moors of Spain and the Huguenots of France in which unparalleled cruelties of every conceivable character and the most profuse bloodshed took place?

If you did not aid in all this most infernal business, transacted in your name, and by your Church, were you totally unconscious of it?

If you knew of it, and possessed the power to stay the red hand of blood, the heavy hand of oppression, or the strong hand of death in this long night of gloom and horror, why in the name of all that is good, all that is merciful, all that is high and holy, did not you, or your all-powerful Father, once stretch forth your hands and stay these giant wrongs?

Could beneficence, mercy and love, sit benignantly, placidly and smilingly, on a golden throne, with all power at hand, and never raise an arm to check this mad monster savagism, intolerance, cruelty and death, which for so many long weary years, in the name of the Christian religion, cursed the fairest portions of the earth?

As a God or as a man, have you at any time dispensed to the human race the blessings which would have been of the greatest value to them?

Would not natural truths, science, positive knowledge, and general education been of infinitely more value to the world, than the gift of your blood, or the relics of ancient paganism which you handed down, or which have been forced upon the world in your name?

Did not your bishops, your priests, and your Church, a few centuries ago, do all in their power to hold back advancing light, intelligence, education and science?

Were not the great discoveries of the truths of Nature, the noble emancipators of our race from the rule of ignorance and error, systematically and persistently hunted down and persecuted?

Were not books, schools, and the printing press, time and time again denounced as of the Devil's agen-cles and opposed by Christian zealots to the extent of their power?

Were not the masses purposely kept in ignorance and filled with superstitious fallacies by those who claimed to be their religious and Christian teachers and guides?

Has not the advance which the world has made in education, science and general intelligence been made in spite of, and in opposition to Christian leaders and the Christian Church?

Let me ask you right here, As God, or as man, are you, or were you ever acquainted with what are called the Sciences?

Do you understand astronomy, chemistry, geology, biology, physiology, psychology, philology, mathematics, geometry, natural philosophy, and natural history in all its branches?

Are these not all valuable and beneficial to the human race, and do they not help greatly in elevating man above the plane of barbarism, sensuality and ignorance?

If you had known these, and had taught them to the world, would it not have been immensely better than to give your blood or to retail the mysticisms, parables and the impracticable injunctions which you presented to the world?

Is it not better and wiser now, to follow in the light of science, reason and truth, than to adhere longer to any of the mythologies, superstitions and absurdities of the past?

Has not man advanced as far as he has, by his own efforts, and is it not vastly better for him to depend upon his own powers, and to exercise them, rather than to look to gods, demi-gods, popes, bishops or priests?

Have not these held the world back in ignorance, darkness and slavery for thousands of years?

Has not your Church been signalized by the fallibility, vice and ignorance of many of its leaders and rulers?

Have you been mindful of the villainous popes who have, from time to time, filled the papal chair, and who claimed to be your vicegerents and special favorites?

Did you approve the conduct of Gregory the Great in the sixth century, who was an aspiring, unscrupulous despot, notorious for his profligacy, cruelty and crimes, and who sanctioned one of the most bloody assassinations ever perpetrated?

Was John XII. in the tenth century a favorite of yours, who was an unscrupulous libertine, gambler, debauchee and murderer, and who turned the Vatican into a brothel?

How did you like John XXIII. in the fifteenth century, who was proved to have been guilty of seventy different kinds of crime, among which was sodomy, simony, rape, incest and murder, and with having illicit intercourse with over three hundred nuns?

Do you not remember the delectable Alexander the Sixth in the fifteenth century who was guilty of incest, who seduced his own daughter, who was the father of many illegitimate children, and reeked in the most abominable crimes, and among the rest murder?

Can you approve of the conduct of many of your modern clergymen who have claimed to be bright lights in your galaxy of stars? What of Ephraim K. Avery, who was guilty of seduction and then the murder of his victim?

How do you esteem Bishop Onderdonk, L. D. Huston, Henry Ward Beecher, John S. Glendenning, and thousands of other clergymen, who have been guilty of dark and damning crimes and debaucheries?

Is it an indication of the purity and goodness of a cause when so many false lights and teachers are claiming to represent it?

Do not the clergymen, who loudly preach in your name, do quite as much to corrupt the morals of the world as they do to improve them?

Do you approve in general of the rich, expensive churches and cathedrals of these times?

Are the $250,000 churches and the $10,000 and $20,000 pastors anything like the times when you were upon earth and wandered listlessly about the fields, on the streets and in the highways?

Would it not be better if these magnificent church-places, where Mr. Moneybags, Mrs. Grundy and Mrs. Uppercrust meet to worship alike the unknown God, and the god of fashion, were all converted into industrial schools, hospitals for indigent widows, imbeciles, helpless cripples, the aged, the infirm and all unable to do for themselves?

Could not many of them be profitably changed into halls of science, where the truths of nature, the useful arts and the various avocations of life might be freely taught to all?

In view of the pride, arrogance, extravagance and hypocrisy of the modern clergy, would it be unsafe to expunge them all as a bad lot?

Would not the hundreds of thousands of priests throughout Christendom, who are entirely an unproductive class, and are living upon the labor and sweat of the toiling classes, be much more profitably employed in useful and productive occupations, thereby earning an honest living?

If the masses who, through ignorance and mistaken notions of virtue and morality, are now induced to support these hordes of pampered, licentious priests, and to build and furnish these costly temples and churches, could be relieved of the onerous expense of all these; and if the priests, who labor not at all in the avocations of industry, were forced to do so, would not the hours of toil for the weary and overworked millions be materially lessened, and would there not be more time for rest, recreation and mental improvement?

Finally, as you now view the field, the past, the present and the future, would it not, in your opinion, be better to wipe out from the face of the earth all the priestcraft, superstition, sectarianism, falsehood, all the absurdities and monstrosities which have so preyed upon mankind, and to inaugurate an era of truth, reason, common sense, science, education, simplicity, fraternity and humanity; discarding false gods, base devils, useless saviors and degrading creeds, and to devote our time and attention to the improvement of this world and to the happiness of the human race?

Pardon me, Dear Sir, if I have been impertinent or bold in my interrogatories. I feel that it is perfectly safe to inquire of you on all the subjects here touched upon, and upon which I wish information.

Should I be successful in obtaining an answer from you, I will be encouraged to ask for more information. But as hinted at in the beginning of my letter, judging from the success I used to meet with, years ago, in the appeals I made to you in thousands of instances, I am prepared to not be disappointed if I receive no reply to this. I am respectfully, and studiously,

A TRUTH SEEKER.

THE GOLDEN AGE.—It is with regret we chronicle the suspension of this excellent literary and semi-liberal paper. It survived the vicissitudes of nearly six years but was compelled at last to yield the struggle. Its patrons were not numerous enough or not prompt enough in renewing. We hope this is not to be the fate of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that a majority of its patrons have not decided it shall cease to exist. While we are loth to think this, we can only say, if they wished to produce that result, they could not take a better course than that which many of our readers are now pursuing.

Every patron who holds back and does not renew when his time has expired, is effectually forcing the breath out of it, the life from its body.

No paper can live in this city which has not a liberal list of patrons who renew promptly.

A few hundred being prompt and ready, will not sustain a paper if four or five times as many hang back and do not lend a hand to sustain it.

Think not, friends, that it is just the right course to pursue, when times are hard and the publisher necessarily feels it as directly and as acutely as any man in the community, to withhold your support, either by not renewing promptly, or saying, "I don't care to take it any longer, you may stop my paper."

We are making an earnest struggle to diffuse light, truth and mental liberty; we are engaged in an unpopular enterprise; we necessarily are denied the recognition and esteem of the popular, hypocritical classes, but we care not for this. We are willing to toil in obscurity and obloquy, and to furnish you with the cheapest Liberal and Freethought reading matter in the country, if you will stand by us, and not be too penurious to sustain us in this glorious labor.

May we not still look in confidence to the Liberals and lovers of truth in America to aid us and support us in the task we have undertaken?

WE ARE RECEIVING DAILY orders for the work we have in progress and propose to bring out in a few months, "THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS AND THINKERS;" but we have not received enough yet to justify our issuing a work so expensive. Many who order the book speak strongly of the great need that exists for a work of the kind, and the value that such a volume will possess. If enough of our readers will take that view of the matter and conclude to patronize us to the amount of $3, for a work richly worth $5, they will please send us their names. We shall not risk bankruptcy in bringing it out on an insufficient guarantee; but if the proper amount of encouragement is extended, we shall bring it out as speedily as possible, and in first-class style. We believe there is no book in the country sold for $3.00, that is better worth the money, than this same work will be. Who else wants a volume of The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers, with over 800 pages, crown 8 vo., with a steel plate portrait of the author, at $3.00, post paid?

VOLUME II OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.—Three numbers after this completes the volume and the year. A limited number of complete copies of Volume II can be furnished at the close of the year. Some will be bound in paper, pamphlet form, and some in boards and cloth. The Volume running sixteen months, from Sept. 1st, 1875, to Jan. 1st, 1876, will contain thirty-two numbers, or 512 pages of good reading matter, including the interesting story of "The Witch of the Wine Mark," the able work of "The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion," and a large number of talented lectures, essays, and long and short communications and selections; making, altogether, a valuable volume for perusal and reference. They will be sent by mail, post paid, at the following prices: In paper, $2.75; neatly bound in cloth, $3.50.

Those who wish a copy of Volume II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will please inform us early and let us know which binding they prefer, so that they may be duly served.

We have Volume I. of THE TRUTH SEEKER in paper, which we send, post paid, at $1.00; when they lack one or two numbers, they will be sent for 75 and 60 cents.

We will send what book-binders call, cases, or covers; for Vol. II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, ready finished and lettered, ready for any book-binder to use for the Volume; these we send post paid for 65 cents. Those wanting them will please inform us, that we may know how many to have made.

VOLUME III.—The time is getting near at hand, when we shall start out with Vol. III. of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a weekly. Many have written us that they will send us in clubs of new subscribers. We hope an effort in this direction may be general. As we propose to give some thirty-seven per cent. more reading matter for the money than now, we need to have our circulation increased to that extent; for thus far, in dollars and cents, we have hardly held our own and unless our circulation can increase largely with the new Volume, we shall lose money. We trust our readers will not suffer this to take place. Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, please try to do what you can for us with for the new Volume. Send in all the names you can, and we will endeavor to furnish you the best and the cheapest Liberal paper in the world. Price of the weekly only $2.00 per year, post paid. Send in the names. Let the truth spread. Send in the names. Let the light shine. Send in the names.

TRUTH SEEKER LEAFLETS.—In the hurry of business, we have not been able so yet these ready to fill the orders received for them; but will be, in a few days. They are a cheap medium for dispensing Freethought and vital truth. Friends, send in your orders; prices 4 cents per doz., 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand, post paid. We give a few more specimens of them in this issue. THE TRUTH SEEK-

ER LEAFLETS and TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS should have a generous and a general circulation. We are getting many very complimentary letters concerning the Tracts, stating that they are just the thing to open the eyes of those who do not see clearly and are troubled with moral blindness. They are destined to be very efficient in the good cause. We will be glad to fill any number of orders for them. Send them in.

THE NEW AGE is the name of a new weekly eight-page paper just issued in Boston, J. M. L. Babcock, Editor and Publisher, A. Walter Stevens, Editorial Contributor, and Wm. Denton, Contributor. No. 1, Vol. I. is a fine specimen of an able literary journal. In the leading article we notice this: "The New Age is not devoted to any special interest whatever, nor the advocate of any special policy." Herein, we think, lies a mistake. It would be better to have a special interest and a special policy than to run without one. We see, however, it is liberally disposed and we wish it good health and a long life. Price $3.00 per year.

THE BURGESS-UNDERWOOD DEBATE will be out in a few days. This full report of one of the ablest four-day's debates ever held upon the topics of the Bible and Christianity is most interesting and instructive to all classes of readers. As both sides are faithfully reported, it affords a specially good opportunity to study the arguments of each side. We will be glad to send a copy to every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In paper 60 cents, in cloth $1.00, post-paid.

THE PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION.—This able and exhaustive little work, together with a sketch of the life of the author, will also be out in a few days. It is a valuable little production for every Liberal reader and student of Freethought. Price in paper 40 cents, in cloth 75 cents. Let us see how many orders we will receive for it.

Those who have copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER No. 26 for September 15th, 1875, and do not care to retain them will confer a favor on a worthy sister and an excellent Liberal, Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va., by mailing them to her. She is anxious to obtain a few copies of that number and as ours is exhausted, we are unable to supply her.

SOUL PROBLEMS is the title of a medium 12 mo. volume by Joseph E. Peck, and published by Chas. P. Somerby of this city. We have been too busy to give it a careful perusal, but it appears to be well adapted for Liberal and earnest thinkers. Price, $1.

MARRIED. ARUNDELL-PATTERSON.—At Wapello, Iowa, on Friday, Oct. 8th, by W. G. Allen, Esq., Mr. Thomas Arundell of San Buenaventura, Cal., to Mrs. A. K. Patterson, nee Amanda Kremer, of Wapello, Iowa.

The parties became acquainted with each other through an advertisement in the Boston Investigator of November last. A visit from Mr. Arundell resulted in a marriage and after spending a few weeks visiting their relatives they started for their home in the fair clime of Southern California, where Mr. A. has resided for the past eight years.

These friends have our best and heartiest wishes, may they live long and happily and leave a numerous progeny behind them.

ELEVATING LABOR. SOMETHING NEW TO BE TAUGHT IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK.—The special committee of the New York Board of Trade, appointed in February last to inquire into the condition of labor in this city and State and to devise measures for the promotion of skilled labor, met last evening. Mr. Chas. H. Haswell was Chairman, and Mr. G. W. Clark was Secretary. The act, passed by the Legislature on the 14th of last May on which the committee base their action, provides that the Board of Education in each city in the State shall cause free instruction to be given in industrial and free hand drawing in at least one department of the schools under their charge respectively. This act will go into effect on the first day of next month. In all the great cities of Europe free schools for the study of the industrial arts are numerous, but in the metropolis of America Cooper Institute is the only institution which is devoted to this purpose, and that is by far inadequate to satisfy the wants of the people. Mr. Haswell said last evening that skilled labor is the great element of national prosperity, and that it behooves us not only to contend successfully with the workmen of continental Europe, but to surpass them. An ample fund should be raised to authorize the renting of a building, to equip it, and to provide suitable instruction in technical studies. Several sub-committees were appointed.

The Bible God Disproved by Nature.

BY WILLIAM EMMETTE COLEMAN.

Delivered before the Progressive Lyceum, America Hall, 615 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Sunday September 12th, 1875.

After a few preliminary observations, of a local character, Mr. Coleman spoke as follows :

Many of the most eminent scientists, and advanced thinkers of the age, emphatically ignore the existence of any power, personal or impersonal, outside of Nature, denying in toto the being of the creator, or the possibility of any such thing as creation, recognizing only perpetual formation from everlasting to everlasting; all the powers, potencies, and principles manifested in Nature, being inherent therein, having always existed and will ever continue to exist. Such a senseless non-entity as a personal God, is utterly repudiated and scouted. No person of any philosophical acumen, or clear perception of the nature of things, can ever subscribe to such a palpable absurdity as the anthropomorphic monstrosity ycleped the God of the Bible, hence the rational, philosophical Rationalist and Spiritualist entirely ignore his existence, relying solely upon the eternal principles of mind and matter inherent in the Universe.

Many Liberalists and Spiritualists, however, acknowledge their belief in what they call the "God of the Universe," or the "God of Nature;" not a personal being, but a more or less Pantheistic God; while some are purely Atheistic; but usually they are more allied to Pantheism than to either Theism or Atheism. Unlike our Atheistic brethren, they generally recognize an intelligence in the Universe, impersonal, so to speak, till individualized in the human organism. The utilization of the instinctive intelligence in the Universe, the focalization of all the principles, forces, and powers in Nature into one distinctive whole, constitutes the Scientist's usual conception of Deity, immutable law reigning supreme in the universal defile organization, as much as in the various organic and inorganic bodies found in Nature's wide domain.

All over the country we find Spiritualists and Materialists fraternizing, as they should do. Liberal Leagues are organized composed of both, and societies formed of Spiritualists and Freethinkers, before whom Spiritual and Liberal lectures are heard. B. F. Underwood and J. W. Pike, Materialistic lecturers, often lecture for Spiritualists, as does that sturdy veteran in the cause of Freethought and intellectual liberty, Horace Seaver, of the Boston Investigator. Clearly, then, the place of the Spiritualists in these debates, is with the skeptics, the Materialists, the Atheists, excepting, of course, when the abstract question of spirit and cognate subjects are under discussion.

Appropos of this subject, in an editorial in the Investigator of Sept. 1st., the oldest and most prominent Materialistic and "Infidel" paper in the country, the following language appears: "If we are not greatly mistaken, nine-tenths of the Spiritualists of to-day will acknowledge themselves Infidel, we mean so far as respects their unbelief in the divine authenticity of the Bible, and this is all that Infidelity signifies. Every one of the Spiritualistic lecturers in this quarter, of any prominence, is anti-Biblical and anti-Christian, and as little affected by the mental poison of Infidelity, as if it were good mental food—and so we think it is. Andrew Jackson Davis, the John the Baptist of Spiritualism, and Prof. Denton, Warren Chase, Gerald Massey, Dr. Storer, Prof. Carpenter, Prof. Toohy, Prof. Morse, and others—the ablest of the Spiritual lecturers—are all anti-Christian or Infidel; and so, likewise, is the Banner of Light, Religio-Philosophical Journal, Hull's Crucible, &c. Therefore, Spiritualism, in its lecturers and its press, is nearer to the Investigator or Atheism, than it is to Christianity."

One of our Theistic friends recently declared, "that no one but a Bible student was capable of properly discussing this subject;" thus intimating that himself and his confreres were better students of Holy Writ (falsely so called) than those on the opposite side. What constitutes a Bible student? Is it those who delve and pore over its pages, with certain preconceived ideas constantly in their minds, bending everything found therein to meet their views, studying the book solely from the Christian standpoint, without examining the various arguments of those of contrary modes of thought? No one can possibly study the Bible fairly, dispassionately and unprejudicedly, believing in it as an infallible divine revelation. Such a believer is biased in its favor, and it is impossible for him to judge impartially and justly of its contents. The various absurdities, contradictions, and immoralities found therein, he either skims over, scarcely conscious of their presence, or else he so turns, twists and distorts them from their pure and simple meaning, as to make them unrecognizable. The most far-fetched and fancied interpretations are given to the clearest and plainest statements; or else, as in the cases of Swedenborg and T. L. Harris, they are so spiritualized, idealized and transcendentalized, that their deformities are concealed, and their hideousness mantled.

Has the gentleman referred to, and his Theistic friends, who have spoken on this floor, made themselves acquainted with the various facts and arguments advanced against Bible infallibility, etc., found in the writings of the Freethinkers of this, and past generations? Are they as familiar with anti-Christian ideas and arguments as anti-Christians are with those of Christians? I think not, indeed, I know not. The flimsy character of most of the views presented by them on this floor—clearly evince their ignorance of the two unanswerable arguments of the noble army of disciples of Freethought, Rationalism and Mental Freedom. No one can be truly qualified to decide upon the merits of the Bible as a divine and infallible revelation, unless he has first examined, in the fullest manner, the best that can be said on both sides of the subject. Have our Christian debaters here, done so? Did they ever examine Volney's "Ruins," and his "New Researches in Ancient History;" Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary," or that ablest of all Atheistic works, D'Holbach's "System of Nature," or even Helvetius' epitome of the "System of Nature;" or Cure Meslier's "Good Sense, (a scarce commodity among Christians, when dealing with theological subjects.) Do they know much about even Rousseau's ideas, (and he was comparatively a feeble Freethinker,) or of Spinoza's "Theological Tractate," or his "Ethics;" or of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of Rome;" or of Dupuis' scholarly "Origin of all Religious Worship?" I wonder if they ever heard of Robert Taylor and his "Diegesis," "Syntagma" and "Devi's Pulpit"? If they ever got hold of his "Diegesis," they must have felt sick after perusing it. They may have liked better Hume's "Essays on Miracles," &c., or Shelley's "Queen Mab," or "Gregg's Creed of Christendom?"

I think it very doubtful if any of our friends ever came across Haslam's famed Letters to the "Clergy and to the Bishop of Exeter," undermining as they do the whole foundation of Christian belief and evidence. Winwood Reade's recent work, "Martyrdom of Man," would also mightily please them, over the left, as would Robert Cooper's "Infidel Text Book," "Bible and its Evidences," &c. Perhaps some of them may have really looked over Paine's "Age of Reason," that being the best known and most widely read of anti-biblical books; but if so, none of them have ever dared to attempt to answer his unanswerable logic and "knock down" arguments.

Another most excellent work, the study of which I earnestly recommend to all Theists and Bible-worshippers, is Higgins' masterly "Anacalypsis." After reading that once, I think they will be "settled." If not, let them at once procure that incomparable production of the great German theologian, D. F. Strauss, I mean his "Life of Jesus," the grandest work on Christology the world ever saw; the greatest specimen of pure analytical reason the human mind has yet produced. No one can come to a clear comprehension of the life and teachings of Jesus, or the value and authenticity of the New Testament records, without reading this work; but if found impracticable to be obtained, (and it is very scarce at present,) then get Thomas Scott's "English Life of Jesus," only published within the last few years, which contains in a small compass, very much that will be found amplified and elaborated in Strauss' much larger work. Perhaps, however, some of our friends may have read that very shallow and superficial Rationalistic "Life of Jesus," by Renan, wishy-washy stuff, in comparison with Strauss or Scott. Then there is Evan Powell Meredith's "Prophet of Nazareth," a recent able English work, critically analytical of the character and teachings of Jesus. "Amphilogia," by the same author is another fine production.

Then again, do our friends on the other side know anything of the various polemical writings of the modern Bvanerges, Bradlaugh, or of his associate, Charles Watts, leaders of the English Secularists, and editors of the London National Reformer, or of the chaste and polished utterances of George Jacob Holyoake, his admirable "Trial of Theism," "Last Trial for Atheism," etc.? Every Theist should certainly read his "Trial of Theism." Or do they know aught of the more impassioned utterances of Austin Holyoake, and of the earlier English Freethinkers, Richard Carlile, Charles Southwell, Henry Hetherington, and Robert Owen, not forgetting our own Ethan Allen's "Oracles of Reason," Abner Kneeland's "Evidences of Christianity Examined," and Hittell's "Evidences against Christianity," also Elisha Palmer's "Principles of Nature"?

An important work recently published in two large volumes, entitled "Supernatural Religion," scholarly and classically written, is specially commended to all believers in the verity of the New Testament writings, and that they are really the productions of those whose names they bear. A little work published a few weeks since, entitled "The Childhood of Religion," by Edward Clodd, would not be bad reading for Bible-believers, and those who swallow down the incredible, nonsensical stories narrated in the "Sacred (?) Scriptures." It shows pretty clearly the origin of many of the myths and legends, the marvelous and fabulous traditions incorporated in the inspired volume, showing their essential oneness with similar fables and legends found among all the nations and tribes of antiquity.

Then we have the rationalistic and so-called Infidel works of the Spiritualists, Andrew Jackson Davis, Hudson Tuttle, Prof. Denton, J. M. Peebles, H. C. Wright, Robert Dale Owen, Warren Chase, and a host of others, including the newly published, "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," by Kersey Graves. This latter is a splendid book for Christian perusal! Not only one crucified savior, Jesus of Nazareth, but absolutely sixteen others in various kingdoms and countries, all teaching essentially the same doctrines, living and dying in pretty much the same manner, and all before Jesus was born, too! Rather a poor show for the Judean Jesus. Only the seventeenth part of an atoning savior! only one seventeenth of a dying God!

Possibly the friends of the Bible God may be somewhat acquainted with the burning words of that greatest and grandest of all preachers, Theodore Parker, or with the inspired utterances of the Sage of Concord, Ralph Waldo Emerson, or those of A. B. Alcott, the transcendentalist; and the Free Religious teachers and thinkers of to-day, Frothingham, Abbott, Higginson, Weiss, Bartol, Wasson, Johnson, Longfellow, Alger, Potter, Chadwick, Conway, Newman and Voysey, not forgetting the long list of publications being issued monthly by Thomas Scott of London.

William McDonnell's excellent works, "Exeter Hall" and the "Heathens of the Heath," should by no means be neglected, calculated as they are to open the eyes of many a benighted, blinded Christian heathen.

Jaccoliot's "Bible in India" demonstrates conclusively the Hindoo origin of a great part of the Bible, both in the Old and New Testaments, and therefore constitutes choice reading for deluded bibliolaters.

Of course our friends have not read Ingersoll's Orations on the Gods, etc. If they had, I opine, they would be very chary thereafter in saying anything in advocacy of the Bible God or any other god; nor do they take much to Underwood's orations and pamphlets. He has too much strong common sense and clear searching logic for them. Then behold the vast army of deep, solid, profound thinkers and rationalists the German mind has produced, all battering away at the now tottering walls of superstition, supernaturalism and ecclesiasticism. Look at Buchner's "Matter and Force," and other works; Feuerbach's "Essence of Christianity," and "Essence of Religion," besides those of Karl Vogt, Monschott, Baur, Paulus, Schleiermacher, and Schopenhauer, and an army of German theological critics and exegesis too numerous to mention, not omitting that intellectual giant, the master scientist of the age, Humboldt the Atheist, Humboldt the Materialist, whose "Cosmos," the masterly production of nearly ninety years of matured thought and research, signally demonstrates the supremacy of Law in the Universe.

De Wette, Ewald, and Kalisch's Commentaries on the Bible, are very useful reading for Bible students, throwing a flood of light upon the imperfections, inconsistencies, mistranslations, and general unreliability of the whole book, hence recommended to the prayerful consideration of all Christians and Hebrews.

But above all should such parties diligently study Bishop Colenso on the "Pentateuch and Joshua." This being the work of a Christian bishop, learned, intelligent, and conscientious, anxious only for the truth, certainly all our Christian friends should read this pointed and searching examination of those six books of the Bible. No one can possibly be thoroughly posted in regard to the Old Testament without reading Colenso, nor of the New Testament without reading Strauss' "Life of Jesus." Being familiar with these two authors, a clear and intelligent conception can be obtained of the origin and purposes of the Testaments and the probable extent of their credibility and authenticity.

Are our theistic friends acquainted with the current Free Thought periodical literature? Do they ever see the Index, Investigator, Truth Seeker, Banner of Light, Religio-Philosophical Journal, Common Sense, Crucible, Spiritual Scientist, Freethinker, Spiritualist at Work, Medium and Daybreak, London Spiritualist, National Reformer, Secular Chronicle, or do they know anything about Holyoake's Reasoner, London Investigator, or the Lion.

Being familiar with all, or nearly all, the writings just referred to, having most of them in my private library, I think I am safely entitled to be called something of a Bible student. Can our opponents state as much? I would also say that I am just as familiar with all the arguments, principles and ideas of the Christians and Theists, as with those of the Skeptic and Atheist. Reared in orthodoxy, a constant attendant upon the Bible class in Sunday School, from my earliest recollection, until a year or two after my emancipation from the shackles of Christian finalities and Bible worship, and having continued ever since in the path of biblical research, I can truly say that there is scarcely an argument on either side biblical or anti-biblical, with which I am not thoroughly acquainted.

In order also to place an intelligent estimate on the Bible and Christianity, it is absolutely necessary to have some acquaintance with the sacred books and forms of thought, of the other great religions of the world. We should, as far as opportunity afford, become familiar with the Koran and Mohammedanism; the Zend-Avesta, and Parsecism or Zoroastrianism; the Vedas, Shaster, Puranas, Uparishads, Ramayana, and Institutes of Menu, in connection with Brahmanism, including also what is sometimes called the Hindoo New Testament, the Bhagavad Gita, readily purchasable in this country, and which consists of Dialogues between Christna and his favorite disciple Arjoun, these two corresponding to the Christ and John of the Bible, the suffix of Christna being dropped to make Christ, and the prefix of Arjoun (ar) being omitted to make John. Christna it is well known, lived 1000 years before Christ, and the Bhagavad Gita is known to have been written long before the Christian era. Also the Tripitika, and Buddhism; the five King and four Shoo of China, and the lives and teachings of the sages Confucius, Mencius and Lao-tse; the Talmud and Judaism; the Eddas, and the Scandinavian, and Teutonic mythology.

Considerable information relative to all these may be obtained from Mrs. Lydia Maria Child's "Progress of Religious Ideas," G. B. Stebbins', "Chapters from the Bible of the Ages," and M. D. Conway's "Sacred Autobiography," and the perusal of any or all of these three books would be of much benefit to our biblical friends.

Commending the foregoing works to the consideration of our opposing friends, I proceed to the discussion of the question in point: Does Nature disprove the God of the Bible? I will endeavor to establish the fact that Nature, through the following branches of physical science, and other departments of systematized knowledge, completely disproves the existence of the Bible Deity, and demonstrates the utter unreliability of his purported revelations, viz: Cosmogony, Astronomy, Geology, Paleontology, Anthropology, Ethnology, Archaeology, Chronology, History, Biology, Physiology, Botany, Zoology, Ornithology, Philology, Geography, Mathematics, Optics, Acoustics, Meteorology, Pneumatics, Hydrostatics, Mechanics, Chemistry, Mineralogy, Psychology, and Military Science, giving one or more illustrative examples in each case.

1. COSMOGONY. According to the teachings of the best scientists, the matter comprising the Physical Universe is alike uncreatable and indestructible, our earth and all other forms of Nature have been gradually evolved through processes of growth and development, inherent in the matter or substance comprising them, the earth and all the suns and planets have been originally composed of nebulous or gaseous matter, which, through extended processes of condensation and solidification, have assumed their present shapes and positions. The Bible God, however, tells us, through his inspired penmen, that he miraculously created our world and everything else in the Universe less than 6000 years ago, the earth having been finished in six days, while all the other worlds, suns and moons were created in one day; our earth, although, in comparison with the rest of the Universe less than the millionth part of a grain of sand, requiring, however, six times as long for its creation as the whole Universe beside. Thus Cosmogony decidedly disproves the existence of the God of the Bible.

2. ASTRONOMY. Nature, through the science of Astronomy, informs us that the sun of our solar system was in existence millions of years before our earth was evolved. The sun having primordially contained within its encircling atmosphere the material from which all its attendant planets, including our earth, were evolved, necessarily pre-existed before any of the planets, and as long ages intervened between the development of each successive planet, the outer ones being first evolved, and our earth being one of the most interior, it follows that myriads of ages must have elapsed from the time when the sun was first developed till the development of the earth. Yet the Bible God reports the creation of the sun four days after the earth was created, an absolute impossibility, and self-evident absurdity, equivalent to saying that a man's father was born four years after his son. Just as sensible; just as true. O, wise God! O, intelligent God! O, truthful God!

Again, the moon being the offspring (so to speak) of the earth was still further separated from the sun as regards the periods of their evolution, yet the Bible God represents them to have been created by him on the same day, as much as to say a man's father and a man's son were both born the same day.

Still, further, the stars of the sidereal heavens Nature teaches us have been progressively developed in like manner as our solar system, it being the type of all systems, one law running through them all, and astronomers inform us that this process of evolution of suns and worlds from nebulous matter is still going on at the present time. They also inform us that they have observed certain stars, the light from which has taken two million years to reach the earth, clearly proving them to have been in existence at least two million years ago. Yet our friend the Bible God tells us they were created the same day the sun and moon were, not quite six thousand years ago.

Saying nothing of the absurdities of light being created three days before the sun, moon, and stars, and of the existence of three mornings and evenings, constituting three days, before the sun was created, there are yet several other peculiar astronomical statements in the "Sacred Word." Joshua's command to the sun and moon to stand still a whole day, and the going back of the sun on the dial ten degrees for Hezekiah, are two marvels so transcendently absurd that it is only necessary to make a passing allusion thereto. Then we have that wonderful star in the East that guided the Zoroastrian Magi, or "Wise Men," to the cradle of the infant God at Bethlehem. Most accommodating star! whose like was never seen before or since. The whole story is so contrary to the known facts of astronomical science that it is not worth serious consideration for a single moment.

The last astronomical wonder, recorded in the previous volume, I shall notice, is the prediction that the stars shall fall from heaven to the earth. The well known law of gravitation which reigns supreme throughout all space, as far we know, renders such a catastrophe an impossibility. Our earth being one of the smallest of the heavenly bodies, if there were any falling to each other to be done, would inevitably fall to the star instead of the star to the earth, and as the stars are, in general, much larger than the earth, only one star would be required to fall upon the earth to cause a general "smash-up" of terrestrial things. There would not be any room for more than one star, and even a great deal too much for that one, owing to the preponderance in size of the falling body. So you see this Baron Munchausen story about stars falling to the earth is all bosh, the worst kind of bosh, as are all the other astronomical statements to which I have alluded. Thus in seven instances, through facts of astronomy, does Nature disprove the Bible God.

In taking leave of this branch of the subject I feel tempted to exclaim, O, the height, and depth, and length, and breadth, of the unsearchable wisdom (?) of God—the Bible God! Verily, a ten year old school boy knew more in one minute than Jehovah knew from the time of Adam to that of John, the illustrious author of that sublime and god-like book, the "Apocalypse or Revelations," the teachings of which are so plain that "a way-faring man though a fool, need not err therein." Query—Did John have the faintest idea what he was talking about when he wrote it? I am sure nobody else ever did.

3. GEOLOGY AND PALEONTOLOGY. Nature, through Geology, declares the earth to be millions of years old, and that vegetable and animal life has existed therein also for millions of years, higher and higher species being gradually developed from the lower. The Bible God says that the earth and all organic nature were miraculously created six thousand years ago in six days. Some pious expounders of the revealed word, anxious to harmonize that which is totally unharmonizable and irreconcilable, say that these six days are six indefinite periods of time, geological epochs. Even supposing this to be the case, (which it is not), the work allotted to each of these days by the Bible God, is not at all in accordance with the revelations of geology. The Bible God says the work of the fourth day was the creation of sun, moon, and stars and nothing else. Now we have seen that Astronomy proves that neither sun, moon, nor stars were created on this day, hence if this fourth day be a geological epoch, millions of years in duration, God must have been idle all these millions of years, as no other work is assigned to him on the fourth day save the creation of the heavenly bodies, which he certainly did not create upon that day or during that epoch. God then must have been at rest on that day, hence the proper Sabbath day is Wednesday, instead of Saturday or Sunday. Here have these poor, deluded Christians and Hebrews been observing Saturday and Sunday as a Sabbath all these thousands of years, while, according to their own theories, carried to their logical conclusion, Wednesday is the true Sabbath day, God's grand rest day.

Again, if the six days correspond to the six Geological Epochs, the seventh day must be the same, and as a Geological Epoch is an indefinite number of millions of years, it necessarily follows that the seventh must be of equal duration, and as only 6,000 years have elapsed since the completion of the sixth, the seventh must still be in operation, in short, comparatively only just begun; and as the seventh day or epoch is devoted to God's rest and refreshment, he must still be resting, and will continue to rest for millions of years hence. Therefore, as God has been idle and unemployed ever since Adam's creation, the whole of the accounts given in the Bible, of God's doings and workings among men must be entirely fabulous. God having been doing nothing all this time, he certainly could not have been continually interfering with the affairs of men, as is reported in the Bible, so all the tales and stories of God talking with men; getting angry and killing thousands in a moment through petty spleen and malignant wrath; all the wondrous miracles therein recorded and ascribed to God, such as making a whale swallow Jonah; aiding Aaron to manufacture frogs, lice and flies; assisting Samson to butcher thirty innocent men, in order that he might rob them of their clothes, so that he might pay a bet; all these elevating, soul-uplifting and virtue-inspiring narratives must be relegated to the domain of the fabulous, mythical and legendary. As the Universe has been getting along so well for the last 6,000 years without the assistance or interference of Jehovah, I think we can dispense with him and his handiwork altogether, for all future time, and obligingly permit him to continue to "take a rest."

The order of creation, as given in Genesis, does not agree with the discoveries of geology. According to the Bible God, grass, herbs and fruit trees were the first created organic substances, while geology proves that the lowest orders of vegetable and animal forms were first brought into existence, such as sea-weed, echinoderms, coral polyps, etc., and many millions of years elapsed before such highly developed vegetable substances, as grass and fruit trees, were evolved. Fish are placed by Genesis as created after herbs, grass and fruits, while every geologist knows fish were in existence ages before the latter. Genesis locates the creation of fish, birds and whales on the fifth day, while reptiles are placed in the sixth day. Now fish were developed long ages before birds and whales; in fact, millions of years elapsed between the development of each of these three orders of animals. Fish were among the earliest animal productions, birds only appearing in the triassic period and whales in the cretaceous. Reptiles, instead of being created after birds, preceded them in order of development, they (reptiles) being a link between fish and birds.

Many other discrepancies could be shown between the Genesal record and the "testimony of the rocks," but time forbids their mention. Thus, in many instances, Nature, through the sciences of Geology and Paleontology, fully disproves the Bible God.

4. ANTHROPOLOGY AND ETHNOLOGY. Nature, through these sciences, teaches us the gradual development of man from the animal kingdom, and his existence on this planet, certainly one hundred thousand years, and probably near two hundred and fifty thousand years ago. Baron Bunsen, the famous Christian savor and Egyptologist, proves that man has certainly existed twenty thousand years. Sir Charles Lyell demonstrates conclusively the great antiquity of man, reaching back far into the past. The presence of man, either contemporary with, or immediately succeeding the Glacial Epoch, which occurred, according to well established principles of calculation based on known astronomical facts, about two hundred and fifty thousand years ago, has been completely established. What then becomes of the puny six thousand years of Genesis? Dissipated into thin air, vanished in smoke, like all the rest of the science of the Bible.

All the races of mankind, black, mixed and white, are derived from Noah, so says the "infallible" authority, but the best ethnologists declare otherwise. Even Agassiz argued strongly in favor of separate creations for the varied types of mankind. Science demonstrates the impossibility of the black races ever to have had white progenitors. Thus we see Nature, through the sciences of Anthropology and Ethnology, flatly repudiating the Bible God.

5. ARCHAEOLOGY, CHRONOLOGY and HISTORY.—These just as fully disprove the Bible narrative of man's recent origin as the kindred sciences of Anthropology and Ethnology, Geology and Paleontology. Remains in various parts of the earth have been found, indicating a high state of civilization anterior to the time of the flood in Genesis, the same continuing uninterrupted for many generations subsequent to that supposed event, thus showing that no such general deluge as is described in the Bible occurred at the time specified. Bunsen says hieroglyphical writing was in vogue in Egypt eleven thousand years ago. Manetho, the eminent Egyptian chronicler, as quoted by Eusebius, the famous church historian, speaks of a succession of dynasties in Egypt lasting 29,925 years. Thus, again, we see the six thousand years of Genesis fade into insignificance.

Jesus is represented by the Bible God as being filled with his spirit, the offspring of the Holy Ghost, and as one with the Father, yet we find him most egregiously blundering as regards the history of his own countrymen, God's chosen people. In Matt. xxiii. 35, he accuses the Jews of murdering Zacharias, the son of Barachias, between the temple and the altar. Zacharias, son of Barachias, was a Hebrew prophet, whose writings constitute one of the books of the Bible, but he was never killed, but died peacefully like other men. Another Zacharias, son of Jehoida, living three hundred and twenty years before the prophet Zacharias, was, however, slain between the temple and the altar. (See 2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22.) Here we have this son of God, or God himself as commonly believed, making a sad blunder in Jewish history, confounding together two entirely different persons on account of the similarity of their names. This one circumstance completely demolishes the infallibility either of Jesus or the record. Either Jesus never made the mistake, and Matthew was inspired to write a falsehood, or else Jesus, the perfect man, or very God (according to the conflicting views of different Christian sects), had forgotten which of the two Zacharias it was that was killed, and, guessing at it, hit upon the wrong one. Our Christian friends can take either horn of the dilemma they elect, both being fatal to their views and theories. So Nature, through the agency of Archaeology, Chronology and History, clearly destroys the reliability of the Scriptural Deity.

6. BIOLOGY. Nature declares the impossibility of animals and men living without having fresh air to breathe. The Bible God says that Noah and his family, and the immense concourse of animals, lived without air in the ark for at least forty days, if not over a year. There was only one small window to the ark, on top, in the upper story, which, with the door, was kept closed, certainly during the rain storm, if not afterwards.

PAINE HALL LETTERS.

ANOTHER FROM D. R. BURT.

MR. EDITOR: I thank you for placing the facts relating to the Paine Memorial Association—and in answer to the enquiries of Mr. Charles A. Codman in relation to the same—before the public. But I will say, with all due respect, that I was not a little surprised by your preface—that it was with feelings of delicacy you did so. Have you delicacy in publishing public facts, every word borne out by the record, and most of them known to yourself as facts, and such as are due the public. Having thrown to the breeze your banner, inscribed, "Truth and Justice, though the heavens fall," we were not prepared for any exhibition of feeling. It is only truth and justice to the public and posterity we ask—nothing for ourselves.

And if those gentlemen, Friend Underwood and Butts, would cease their pettifoggery and specious pleadings about the honest payment of obligations and unselfishness of men in the past—which have no relation to the case at issue—and would approach the subject with firmness and kindness, advising the Boston parties to make a clean breast of it, by inviting a searching investigation, and proposing to bind themselves to abide the decision of a Board of Trustees, properly appointed and judiciously selected, to represent the interests of all, say seven, nine, eleven or thirteen, whichever would be best, and transfer to said board and their successors, the Paine Memorial property, to be held and controlled by them in all future time; to organize under the general law of Massachusetts, which requires not less than seven trustees, as an educational institution, and thus save all taxes in future, then the above-named gentlemen would prove themselves the real friends of the cause and the friends of those who have wrested the funds from their proper custody, and refuse to loosen their grasp only upon conditions which they are pleased to offer.

Has not Mr. Mendum established his unfitness to control the matter since the lamentable departure? Had he followed instructions of the Board, every dollar of expense would have been paid by this time. It is known that his departure caused the loss in New York of $13,000. I have a friend that was and is anxious to give all his property to an institution similar to what this was originally designed to be, amounting to $30,000. I can also name a friend who would give $1,000, and three others that would give $500 each, had all been honorably conducted.

When in California, I received a proposition from Mr. Joseph Lee, of San Jose, a worthy citizen and a friend of the cause, who proposed to borrow $3,000 for three years and return $6,000, giving the best of security for the faithful performance of the same, as a means of aiding the cause and himself at the same time.

I retained $3,000 in the bank for a time, and wrote to Mr. Mendum the facts. He telegraphed and wrote me not to loan any part, but to bring it all away. I then forwarded the money by draft, less $15.00 exchange. Thus was lost to the fund $2,500. This will throw a little light on the "frittering" process named by Mr. Mendum.

Mr. Lick has often stated, had the business been properly handled to ensure its safety for the objects designed, he would have made his gift amount to $50,000 to each fund, to wit, the "Lecture" and the "Memorial," $100,000 in all. This sum, together with the promised subscriptions unpaid, and which never will be in all probability, unless the conditions be changed, amounting to $4,361.51, these several sums, amounting in the aggregate to $135,361.51, will all be lost to the Paine Hall Fund, unless the enterprise or institution be satisfactorily secured to posterity, as originally contemplated.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I plead with you and with those above referred to, as well as with all who love the cause, to use every effort for the restoration of that union, confidence and enthusiasm, which, like a halo of light, clustered around the first inception of the Paine Hall movement—dispensed and attenuated, though it undoubtedly now is on account of the suicidal conduct of its professed friends—yet I earnestly hope the original purpose may yet be attained in the erection of a Temple of Reason dedicated to the truth as it is in Nature, and held in trust for that sacred object to our successors forever.

With the kindest feelings of respect, I remain fraternally yours in friendship and truth.

Dunleith, Ill.

D. R. BURT.

* P. S. I enclose a letter from J. Warner, of Patch Grove, Grant Co., Wis., a contributor to the Hall fund, which be pleased to publish for its very proper suggestions, and expression of feelings generally entertained. Very respectfully, yours for truth, justice and friendship,

D. R. B.

PATCH-GROVE, WIS., Sept. 4, 1875.

D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill. Dear Sir: Not having seen you since your expedition to Boston last winter at dedication of the Paine Memorial Building, I take this mode to enquire as to the condition of the property, title to the same, funds used in purchase of grounds and erection of building. I surmise by Mr. Altman's letter that there is one or more screws loose as to title, funds used, and controlling management.

Now, it still appears to me, as I told you at my residence last winter, that there are two ways of making all plain and clear—first, a special charter from the legislature of Massachusetts. Second, an organization of a corporation under the general laws of the State making trustees and legal successors who shall control the property. It would seem certain to me that, under the present management, there is no legal title or control to the Liberals who have furnished the money so far, and more money is constantly wanted. Is there not danger of the building becoming the property of certain individuals, or is it not already so? May not these individuals sell said property to the Y. M. C. A., or for a shoe factory at their pleasure? (I do not believe they would, but their heirs or assigns may.) I observe that yourself and Mr. Altman, as trustees, take little part in the Building. What is the matter? Are you free to say? Is there not a probability that the mortgagee will soon take the building? I should like to know all about this matter. Is it right, or is it wrong? Please say at your convenience, and oblige your friend,

J. WARNER.

DUNLEITH, ILL., Oct. 20th, 1875.

TO A. K. BUTTS, ESQ.—My Dear Sir: I noticed in the last TRUTH SEEKER your article, in which you mention a proposition from the parties holding the title to the Paine Memorial property, which you proposed to offer to the public, and which you consider will be satisfactory to the wishes and expectations of all except a fraction of the Liberals of the country. Nothing could be more satisfactory to my feelings than to have it properly adjusted, and controlled by men who desire it as a public institution, and not the means of advancing the personal aggrandizement of any one man, or any three men.

It must be admitted that the irregularities of these men were, and are, a grave error. But if they will now invite investigation, and propose to convey in proper time to a Board of Trustees, properly selected, and abide the determination of that Board as an investigating committee, I should judge that the matter could be adjusted. I ask nothing but that the original objects of the association be carried out, and in order to do this, it is necessary to increase the number of trustees to enable an organization to be effected under the general laws of the State of Massachusetts for such purposes. If, by any fair and honorable mediation, you can be the means of affecting this, you will have earned the title of public benefactor.

Fraternally your friend,

D. R. BURT.

FROM M. ALTMAN.

OFFICE OF M. ALTMAN & CO.,
301 & 303 Sixth Avenue, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: Were it not for a single word in the letter of A. K. Butts in your last issue I would not trouble you with this note so soon, and that word is "third," which he italicizes (in the passage "for the third time, etc.") thus insinuating that I had noticed him before, by way of controversy or argument.

As far as my memory serves me I never had any difficulty with him, and have not the remotest idea of what he means when he says I "may for a third time fail to hit him," unless he refers to the following circumstances. Some three or four years ago, this man, Butts, called upon me several times for the purpose of inducing me to advertise in the Index or to subscribe for its stock. I refused several times, but he was persistent and importunate; finally I made him the following proposition, to wit: That I would subscribe for $100 worth of Index stock upon condition that he would subscribe $100 to the Paine Hall Fund. This he agreed to. I at once sent $10 to the Investigator and a letter giving the particulars, which $10 was credited to, and acknowledged as coming from Butts. He sent $10 to the Index which was credited to me. Thus far the contract was kept by him; but the next year I received notice from the Index Association that my second installment was due. I wrote to Mr. Abbot informing him that the Association must look to Mr. Butts for the second $10; and giving him the details of our agreement. He replied, stating that Butts owed them more money already, than they desired, and the result was that I paid that $10 and six subsequent ten dollars making $80 on said stock; and when I called Butts' attention to the violation of his contract, his reply was evasive and discourteous; at any rate he never paid one dollar to the Index Ass., besides the first $10 above mentioned. If he knows of any other difference, difficulty, or controversy I ever had with him, let him speak out, giving facts as I have done.

I have no difficulty with him, even now; for what in the world has he to do with the Paine Hall or its fund? From what we know of him, he must be much more familiar with the funds of the Index Association than with that of Paine Hall. We certainly never heard of him in connection with our cause until he was turned out of the Index Association. Who is this "Busy-body Meddlesome," who rushes into print to defend better men than himself against charges never made?

Mendum and Seaver are honest, upright men, and I have never said anything to the contrary. I have had dealings with them continuously, ever since 1859 and in all their dealings have always found them strictly honest and conscientious; and yet I say that they have made mistakes in this Paine Hall matter. I repeat again, that in my judgment, the mistakes made were honest ones; yet they should be, as they can be, rectified.

It surely does not require Butts' word to assure us that Mendum and Seaver are honest, and no man deserves special credit for being honest, and why should Butts insist upon defending them when they require no defence, unless he intends drumming the country for advertisements and commissions as he did when a Free Religionist. The old adage is remembered—"When the Devil was sick the Devil a monk would be, but when the Devil was well the Devil a monk was he."

I trust, Mr. Editor, that whatever is written upon the Paine Hall Fund should bear upon that question directly. As far as I am concerned I am done with side issues and irrelevant personal gossip. I stand by what I wrote in my first card, and will prove all I have said, if denied by any two parties interested—not outsiders.

M. ALTMAN.

[The following letter from A. K. Butts is on the other side of this unfortunate matter, and we insert it just as freely as the above. Mr. Butts is recognized as the authorized spokesman for the Boston parties.]

THE PAINE HALL, ONCE MORE.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20th, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: I seem to come in for attack, from far and near. While I am disposing of Mr. Altman here in New York, an honored voice from the shore of the Mississippi denounces me for what he considers my bad advice to the Liberal people. I thank you again for the permission to defend myself. I rejoice that in defending my advice on this subject, I shall incidentally be defending those standard bearers of our cause, whose devotion started, and whose ability carried on the Paine Hall enterprise. I only wish their defence had fallen to abler hands. However, before this controversy is over I expect abundant assistance. Notwithstanding the virulent insinuations which have been cast about privately among the Liberals for months past, there have been no deep seated prejudices established except in some half-dozen minds and I am safe to say that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand in our ranks will be glad to return to that almost unlimited confidence which they have reposed in Messrs. Seaver and Mendum for more than one third of a century. And I predict that before the next anniversary of Paine's birth these two men will receive more of honor and gratitude for their self-sacrificing labors in this cause than at anytime heretofore. Either I and the majority of Liberals have been miserably befooled and juggled with,—and that for many years—or Mr. Burt's mind has recently been distorted, dazed, soured and turned into a nest of haunting doubts and horrid suspicions. Mr. Burt, against my earnest protest, summons the Liberal public to decide which of us is mistaken, and I accept the issue. I never had but two hours conversation with Mr. Burt in my life. It was conducted mostly by him and concerned only this trouble. Although opposed to him from the start on this question, I was impressed by his apparent honesty of purpose and natural nobleness of character.

At the close of Mr. Burt's narration, I told him I still had absolute confidence in the honesty of Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, and further, in their anxiety to accept of any compromise which could be demanded by any candid Liberal. I begged him to remain a week or two longer in New York, to see what could be done.

I understood him to promise me absolutely and unconditionally, that he would do so. He left my office immediately and left town for the West within twelve hours without the least word to me. Right here let me say that I must never be understood to cast any reflections on Mr. Burt's honesty. He doubtless forgot his promise, and I trust I shall maintain the respect due to his age, as it is about double mine, and to his services, which are, doubtless, just as he describes them.

But if we measure by the latter, I am as well entitled to a respectful hearing, when I presume to advise your readers as before. When he mentions hundreds, I could mention thousands of dollars spent in the cause of Freethought, and where he mentions weeks, of devotion thereto, I could count at least as many months. Something more than honesty and devotion should be demanded, however, when a man makes such outrageous and scandalous attacks on venerated leaders of a noble cause. Mr. Burt should have been accurate, just and self forgetful, not to say kind, candid and reasonable.

That he has been neither one nor the other I propose to prove. First, accuracy, Mr. B. is entirely mistaken when he asserts in private and public, that the land on which Paine Hall stands is the property of the Boston Trustees, individually to be liable for their individual debts or to go to their heirs. The property is held by them as "joint tenants." This Mr. B.

ought to know as quite a different thing from "tenants in common."

The legal papers in this case were drawn by a distinguished infidel lawyer of Boston, and under them so long as either of the three Trustees lives and remains faithful to his trust, there cannot be the slightest alienation of the property. They have the power to appoint their own successors, and to suppose that they intend to appoint improper persons to that office, is too absurd for argument.

Mr. Burt's figures are inaccurate. There is only $62,000 of mortgage on the property, instead of $70,000. Mr. Altman signed for $10,000, instead of $5,000, and the former was all which he was legally required to sign. He signed without protest too.

Again, Mr. Mendum and the rest have never "positively refused" to re-deed the property to "a legal body of Trustees." On the contrary, they have always been ready and eager to make it over to any man, or set of men, who would assume their liabilities and responsibilities.

Mr. Burt conveys the idea that he and Mr. Altman were put out from the Board of Trustees. This is not so. Mr. Altman virtually took himself out and carried Mr. Burt with him. When they wished to come back they had the same right there as any of us who might have been acceptable, but were not. If Mr. Burt were a younger or less worthy man, I should accuse him of quibbling on some other points.

Mr. B. says that I referred to Mr. Codman's inquiries without answering them. This point I will leave to your readers, especially to those who knew of no covert meaning in Mr. Codman's letter. Ostensibly, his letter was to ascertain what bearing the history of the Boston enterprise could have upon our desire to erect a similar hall here, and to that inquiry I did reply fully. Messrs. Altman and Burt may see the time when they will wish that I had succeeded in repressing this scandal for a still longer time. I accuse Mr. Burt of injustice. Let us see. He ignores the fact that the five Trustees were just as much an illegal body as the three. He knows, I presume, that had they been a legal body under the laws of Massachusetts, two more would have been required, and in case of vacancy, their ranks could have been filled by the Judge of the Supreme Court, who would be as likely to put in Christians as otherwise. He accuses the Trustees of violating their own vote as to the cost of building. Now when we get all the figures before us, it will appear that the cost of the building did not exceed but a trifle the $60,000 voted. The land cost $25,000 besides, and the furniture a sum at present unknown to me. Everyone knows that estimates in such cases usually fall short of actual outlay. If Mr. Burt's construction, that the entire expense was to be covered by $60,000, should have been adopted, we should have had a mean little affair enough, instead of that elegant, substantial and well furnished hall, which is and will be, (unless Messrs. Burt and Altman succeed in their work) forever a pride and satisfaction to the Liberal people. As to the lecturers' fund, it was invested in a manner which, doubtless, the donors would have approved, and the proceeds are now being applied to occasional free lectures in Paine Hall. There is but one public lecturer of note connected with us outside of Boston, and Mr. Underwood has never asked for a cent from this fund. An army of lecturers can not be created and sent out on the income of $11,000.

I say Mr. Burt should have been more self forgetful. His many valuable services do not entitle him to destroy the work of his co-laborers: "to blow the whole thing higher than Beecher's 'Life of Christ,'" merely because he could not have his own way. He was out-voted and should have retired more gracefully.

Here is the pith of the whole matter. Let it further appear if Mr. Burt shall frankly reply to the inquiries below. I regret that Mr. Mendum has been several weeks absent on his trip to California, and some facts and figures I withhold till his return. As Mr. Altman would have it believed that I do not know much about the Paine Hall, I confess I may learn more in time. I don't know it all yet. It don't take an omniscient mathematician to see the root of these "differences." Some little trust may be placed in men whose reputation for nearly forty years has been as unquestioned for integrity and uprightness, as it has been open and widely known of all men.

It is in private circles that Mr. Mendum is best known and most beloved. On one occasion in Boston I met a silver-haired but vigorous old gentleman, editor of a popular religious weekly, who had known and watched his career up from the time they were apprentices together. Though utterly opposed to Mr. Mendum on matters of religion, he bore cheerful and emphatic testimony to Mr. Mendum's uprightness and probity of character. Said he: "I've known Mr. Mendum well for over forty years, and the first grain or germ of a lie or a cheat is not in him, and never was." I learned that though he is such an open and uncompromising infidel, his neighbors and fellow citizens of Melrose township, hold him in the highest personal esteem, and would gladly, if he would accept, give him any office in their power to bestow.

It is a great pleasure to refer to Mr. Underwood's testimony here, and surely he has some opportunities of knowing.

Mr. Mendum's best friends will admit that he is often too rough, harsh and uncompromising. I should have been glad if he had been less so, for instance with Messrs. Burt and Henderson. But these faults are common amongst us. They are but exaggerations of the virtues of frankness, uprightness and individuality. "When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war." It is unfortunate that some of the few who are fighting Mr. Mendum should have similar peculiarities. While we are waiting for Mr. Mendum's return I should like to ask Mr. Burt a few questions which shall be in the best temper and utmost respect toward him personally—I trust he will answer me as considerably as he did Mr. Codman.

1st. How long after he became a trustee was it before he became so suspicious of the Boston men as to send his proxy as trustee to Mr. Altman?

2d. Who caused these suspicions and how?

3d. Was there ever any legal organization of the five trustees?

4th. When Mr. Burt obtained money from the Lick property and others, and turned it over, as he says, to Mr. Mendum did he ask or obtain any security therefor? In other words, what then was the "nature of the instrument under which they"—or Mr. Mendum—"hold the trust for posterity?"

5th. If as Mr. B. says, Mr. Altman and himself exacted "not the shadow of security," then why does he blame me now that the Paine Hall is a fact accomplished, and by its history, its adaptability and infidel inscriptions, etc., to say nothing of the integrity of the joint tenants, is "perpetuated for the purposes intended," why does he blame me for advising Liberals to the very same thing which they—Messrs. A. and B.—did so freely?

6th. As the contributions were sent in by reason of the advertisements of the enterprise in the columns of the Investigator, and on the faith of the only two men who were well known to Liberals, how does it appear now that they have proved themselves rascals according to Mr. Burt that the increase of their number to five would make the matter any more secure to the purposes intended? If we can't trust Scaver and Mendum, whom we think we do know, how can we trust Altman and Burt, whom we do not know? Is discord any security? Is not the chance for harmony lessened by increase of numbers?

7th. If it was right for the five men to go on in this matter without legal organization or other security, how can it be wrong for the three men to do the same?

8th. Does not Mr. B. know that the deed was originally made out to the five names, sent on to Mr. Altman, who acting for himself and as attorney for Mr. Burt refused to assume any responsibility in the matter, and sent back the deed to Boston, telling the Boston men to do as they liked, i. e. to go on without him?

9th. I proposed to Mr. B. that he and his friends go to work and form a legal body of trustees or stockholders and make the Boston men a square offer to assume the liabilities and responsibilities. I vouched for their acceptance of such offer. Now has Mr. B. any well defined plan other than this which he would have the Boston men adopt? Would he force into their company a man who refused to act with them, and who is distrusted by them, and who could not harmonize with them unless he could rule them, and who evidently acted from selfish motives from beginning to the end?

Mr. Editor I did what I could to postpone or suppress this controversy but now we are in it let there be enough of it to settle for once and all who is the villain of this play.

When Mr. Mendum returns you will hear from him or from me further.

I trust your compositor will deal kindly with me this time. In my first letter he made me say "memorable" where I had written venerable, and "well reasoning" where I wrote well meaning, and in the last line but one in my last letter he left out the quotation marks to the three words, "honest (I hope);" these were Mr. Altman's words, not mine.

Yours, for truth and justice,

ASA K. BUTTS.

PAINE HALL.

Mr. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As one who has been acquainted with the movement to build this Hall since its inception, I wish to say that the charges brought by Mr. Burt, against Messrs. Scaver, Mendum and Savage, are entirely without foundation, and they can be properly characterized only as falsehoods. Just as soon as I am able to write a letter, I shall furnish you with the facts to demonstrate the truth of this assertion. In one sentence, the case stands thus: Mr. Burt is not recognized among the Trustees, because he, or his attorney for him, refused to do what he had agreed to do. One word more, the property could in no way be as safely held for perpetuation in the interest of Free thought as it is now.

Yours Respectfully,

CHARLES ELLIS.

Greenwood, Mass., Oct. 19, 1875.

THE cranberry crop this year is estimated at 210,000 bushels, against an average of about 275,000. Cape Cod and New England produce 75,000 bushels, New Jersey 90,000, New York 5,000, and the Northwestern States 40,000. The fruit is said to be of nice quality.

Business Notices.

[In this column short notices will be inserted at 10cts. a line.]

Write to A. M. BURNS, Manhattan, Kansas, (enclosing stamp,) and get one of his circulars in reference to Burns' Seedling Raspberry. One of the hardiest, surest bearers and best varieties in existence for the severe climate of the northwest. They have been in cultivation fifteen years, and in that time they have not Winter-killed nor failed to bear bountifully.

The Liberal lectures by Prentice Mulford, announced as to be held at Masonic Hall, will be given at Trenor's new Hall, 1266 Broadway, between 32d and 33d streets, at 8 o'clock. Admission free. They are good. Let all attend who can make it convenient.

We would call the attention of our readers to the card of G. L. Henderson & Co., in another column by which it will be seen that they are still engaged in supplying their Western friends with goods.

It gives us pleasure to recommend Mr. Henderson and his associates to all who may need their services, knowing that whatever business or trust that is confided to them will be faithfully and conscientiously performed.

MOODY AND SANKEY are coming to save the souls of all poor Spiritualists, Infidels, Free Religionists, etc., at small expense, but the Wakefield Earth Closet Co. will save the soles of the ladies and children, the sick, aged and infirm from the dangers of ice and snow, mud and slush while on their shivering journey to that ancient nuisance in the back yard, which is misnamed a privy. Moody and Sankey's work may last a season, but the Wakefield Earth Closet will last a lifetime. Now is the time to buy. Send to 38 Dey street, New York.

Friendly Correspondence.

A. W. SMITH, Denver, Col., writes: I think your paper has improved much. I am glad you are going to make it a weekly. I am a thorough Liberal, and never let an opportunity pass to advance Liberal ideas.

C. W. HALL, P. M. Rock Rapids, Ia., writes: The good work is still progressing here. There have been two clergymen here for two years, but they cannot get a foothold. One lately left—the other will leave soon. Truth must prevail.

J. COMPTON, Volo, Ill., writes: I would not do without your paper for $10 per year. I am very thankful you are to send it to us every week. Two weeks is too long to wait for it. It is worth more than a thousand dollar minister, and far more safe with the SISTERS.

ALBERT J. GOULD, Covington, Ind., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a valuable and instructive journal, and I, for one, cannot do without it. Keep up the good fight, deal your earnest blows against Biblical superstition and bigotry, and may success attend you.

JOS. W. PASSMORE, Embreeville, Pa., writes: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as the enclosed remittance entitles me to the same. I think by that time all will be said that can be upon theology. I would like to hear from you or somebody else on the money question. Just now this seems to be the question of the day. Sometime since I read an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, written by Mr. Davis of Philadelphia, on this question, which I thought very good. I keep the THE TRUTH SEEKER around among my friends. Some like it very much, while others scold me for having such a paper about.

JOSEPH NOYES, Richford, Vt., writes: I saw in the last number of your paper the name of La Roy Sunderland, which produces peculiar feelings, carrying me back to 1838-40. Then Nathan Bangs, D.D., and the Methodist church treated him shamefully for preaching against the institution of negro slavery. I threw the Christian Advocate and Journal aside, and took a paper edited by Sunderland. We were both Methodists, and both anti-slavery. I am glad we have both concluded to worship the God of the Universe, and to reject the Christo-Jew God. I was much pleased with your paper on the Gods.

BRICK PALMER, Paradise Valley, Nev., writes: Your bold and independent style of writing has done much good in Paradise. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the principal paper taken here. It does not fear to speak the truth at all times. The citizens here have concluded to protect themselves by organizing a Grange. We hope to be able to secure ourselves against the two great monopolies that are seeking to grind the farmer between them, as between the upper and lower mill-stone. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not quite bold enough to suit me. I say that men who make a living by taking God's name in vain and by teaching that Christ is the son of God, should not be tolerated in society. They are wolves in sheep's clothing, over on the watch for our women and wine, our chickens and coin.

GEO. L. JONES, Vanville, Wis., writes: May reason and Nature (the highest God) bless your noble efforts to free the mind from the traditions of ignorant ages. It is a gigantic work you have before you, Brother; but stand firm, and success and honor will finally be yours. Since it cost five hundred thousand lives and immense treasure, to free the bodies of four millions of blacks in this country, what must be the task of freeing all the millions of mental slaves. But courage, Brother, our army, though small, is the most valiant that ever trod the soil of freedom. The pen of Col. Ingersoll is mightier than the swords of ten thousand captains. We have the school-house which is a terror to superstition. We also have great power through the press. Were it not for cowardice it could blow eternal intelligence through the traditions. Slowly, but surely, we are advancing. The brave are taking the foremost ranks, and standing shoulder to shoulder, with their white-robed sister, Science. All the thunderings from the pulpit, "the coward's castle," intimidates none. We must prove ourselves worthy of that noble Deist, upon whose banner was inscribed: "The world is my country, to do good my religion." We must withstand the enemies of our Liberal institutions, who to-day are seeking to put three gods in the people's place in our Constitution, if "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," are to be guaranteed to the citizens of this republic.

THE BHAGAVAD-GITA;

Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna.

A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM,

TRANSLATED, WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days: the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than deific commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is in the plan of salvation instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's. At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flend came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them he work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

'More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west.'—Inter-Ocean.

'This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science.'—Our Fireside Friend.

'This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life.'—Overland Monthly.

'This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profounder sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people. The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chronology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book. Grandly useful, especially as it is thoroughly indexed.'—Chicago Evening Journal.

'A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations.'—Truth Seeker.

'This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people.'—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

The book is a 12mo. of 278 pages, and the mechanical part is finished in a superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. THE

HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "EXETER HALL."

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH. "Rich in romantic and pathetic incident." It exhibits, with a terrible array of facts, the atrocities committed by the Christian Church at various times. It shows that "the purest morals existed without the Bible," and that many of the Heathen Philosophers were as great lovers of virtue as the characters named in the Bible. Shocking instances are given of the depravity of many Christian ministers, and of the prevailing inhumanity among Christian people. "The folly of Foreign Missions, while the heathen at home are neglected, is powerfully illustrated." "On the whole it is the work of a master hand." "A work of unaffected beauty," and its most valuable feature is, all positions are proved and authorities given.

EXETER HALL.

"Beautiful, tender, delicate, and pathetic in its appeals." "A truthful portrait of the mischievous tendencies of religion." It is a "denial of the authority and inspiration of the Bible." It portrays the "development of the practical effects of religious fanaticism as seen in the family and in society." "Altogether it is the most scorching book ever published in America since the 'Age of Reason.'"

Paper, 60c.; Cloth, 80c.

These two great works should be in the library of every searcher after truth and every lover of mental liberty. The two in paper will be sent for $1 50; in cloth for $2 20.

Odds and Ends.

THE BUMP OF DESTRUCTIVENESS.—A railway collision.

SOMETHING a rich man always wants and a poor man always has.—Nothing.

If a sweetheart is called a turtle-dove, a coquette must be a mock turtle-dove.

WHY is a dishonest bankrupt like a poor man?—Because both fail to get rich.

THE greatest "affair of the heart" known to science is the circulation of the blood.

THE man who recently knocked down an elephant, a lion, and a rhinoceros, was an auctioneer.

WHY is a marriage certificate like an article the public cannot do without?—Because it is a noose-paper.

WHEN a girl tumbles and hurts herself badly, the first thing she does is to get up and look at her dress.

"Bah!" said John Henry's hopeful to a small boy who wanted to whip him, "you couldn't lick a postage stamp."

You need never scruple to seize time by the forelock, for he'll be pretty sure to pull out yours if you live long enough.

"ANY letters for Mike Howe?" asked an individual of a clerk at a post-office window. "No letters for anybody's cow."

A TRAVELER called for mint sauce at a hotel the other day, and the waiter said they had none, adding: "Our cook makes all the mince into pies, not sauce."

EUGENE—"Come sit down on the shelly shore, and hear the mighty ocean roar."

Amelia—"I can't sit down you silly goose because I'd burst my pin-back loose."

"FATHER," it tells here of illuminated MSS. What are they lighted with?"

"Lighted with? Oh—why—my son, they are lighted with—with the light of other days."

CROWING boy on the fence to boy on the walk. "You ain't got no baby at your house." Sneering boy on the walk to boy on the fence. "I don't care, our dog has got six pups, aha-a."

"Augustus, dear," she said, tenderly pushing him from her, as the moonlight flooded the bay-window where they were standing. "I think you had better try some other hair dye—your moustache tastes like turpentine."

WHEN you see a woman with a raw-hide hid in the back drapery of her mornin'-wrapper, and calling "William Henre-e-e" in a key about four octaves above high C, you may know that a whaling expedition is about to set sail.

AN Indian and a white man were passing along a street in an American city, when the former espied a window full of wigs; pointing to the owner, who was standing in the door-way, he said: "Ugh! Him great man—big brave—take heap scalps!"

A CHICAGO woman advertises in the Marriage Bazaar: "I want an honorable, honest gentleman for a husband. No lawyer, doctor, or politician may apply. I will give my future husband on my marriage day $10,000 cash, and twice that amount in real estate. I am 22 years of age, 5 feet 4½ inches high, weight 140 pounds, a good musician, and well educated. Editor has address."

Logic—"Eat your bread, Charles, do not fling it away," said a learned and a good judge to one of his family; adding, "for who knows, in the vicissitudes of this life, if you may not some day want it." The old gentleman had to cough, look learned and go away, when the youngster answered more logically, "If I eat it, how can I have it when I want it?" This is the result of a learned judge having children.

BUYING A WATCH.—A respectably dressed, but woe-begone-looking individual entered a New York horse car, and pitifully asked: "Is there any one here who will buy this watch? My wife lies dead in the house and I want twenty dollars to bury her with." A passenger handed over the twenty dollars, pocketed the watch, and the man, after bestowing his blessing, departed. Another look at the watch convinced its new owner that two dollars was the market price for it.

A SLIGHT HINT.—A bashful youth was paying his addresses to a lass of the country, who had long despaired of bringing things to a crisis. He called one day when she was alone at home. After settling the merits of the weather, Miss said, looking slyly into his face:

"I dreamt of you last night."

"Did you? Why, now!"

"Yes, I dreamt you kissed me!"

"Why now! What did you dream your mother said?"

"Oh, I dreamt she wasn't at home!"

A light dawned on the youth's intellect, and directly something was heard to crack—perhaps it was his whip, and perhaps not; but in about a month more they were married.

A young lady of engaging personal appearance, who arrived in Burlington, Iowa, recently from Creston, announced that she was going to open a barber shop on North Hill. The very next day each married woman on North Hill surprised her husband, whose many virtues she had long known and admired, with a neat little present, consisting of a razor, lather-brush and strop. And now, as oft as a North Hill man comes home, the wife of his bosom puts her arms around his neck and rubs her downy cheek against his face, in all apparent innocence and affection; but if his cheek is smoother than when he went away from home in the morning, she fans him with the rolling-pin until he has to wear his hat on which ever lump it will fit best.

JACK AND JILL.

"To climb that stately eminence,"
Says Jill to Jack, "I go;
And if thou lov'st, then follow me,
Follow in weal or woe."

Says Jack to Jill: "Whate'er thou wilt,
Thy will is law to me;
And if to climb thou dost desire,
Lead on! I'll follow thee."

They climbed the hill, but all too soon
Repentance came to Jill;
For Jack he tripped upon a stone,
And tumbled down the hill.

"O Jack! O Jack! My own true love!
Oh, 'What a fall was there!'
Behold! Like thee, I'll crack my crown.
For what thou dar'st, I dare!"

"I called on thee to follow me, Whilst climbing up the hill."
With one wild shriek, "I follow thee!"
Were the last words of Jill.

—Boston Advertiser.

WAITING FOR A CAVE.—Three or four days ago, within two or three miles of this city, a Washington street merchant, who had business in the country, came to a small creek, beside which a native was washing his shirt. The man was sousing the garment up and down and around, and as he "soused" he whistled a merry tune.

"Do you have to wash your own shirt?" inquired the merchant as he halted.

"Not allus, but old Bet has got one o' her fits on jest now," was the ready reply.

"Then you don't agree very well?"

"Partly well on the general thing. Bet's kind o' mulish, and I'm kind o' mulish, and when we get our backs up we crawl off to see who'll cave first."

"I should think you would want some soap?"

"I do."

"Why don't you get it, then?"

"That would be caving to Bet, stranger. She's squatted on the only bit of bar soap 'tween here and Vicksburg, and she's jest aching for me to slide up and ask her for it."

"And you won't?"

"Stranger," replied the native, as he straightened up, "don't I look like a feller that would wear a shirt three months afore I'd cave in and holler for soap?"

The merchant sided with him, and as he drove on, the man soused the shirt up and down and whistled:

I'm gwine up the river—
Hear me holler.

THE indictments for libel against Tilton and Moulton were ended recently by a nolle prosequi in the Brooklyn City Court. This amounts to an admission of adultery on the part of Henry Ward Beecher, while it adds nothing to his reputation as respecting the sanctity of an oath.—N. Y. Sun.

THE great astronomer of Paris, Leverrier, who discovered the planet Neptune, which could eat up this little earth of ours and not suffer from indigestion in consequence, has made a prediction which is noteworthy. WE have received assurance that the charge against Julius Wittrup, recently referred to in these columns, is founded upon no positive proof; albeit, it had current circulation in the neighborhood where the transaction was said to have occurred. THE Ohio river is the greatest coal carrier in the world, notwithstanding the fact that it is frozen up during most of the winter, and nearly dried up a large portion of the summer. A "run" of coal was made during the month of July last, when 375,928 tons were shipped in forty-eight hours. It would have loaded over 37,000 eight-wheel cars, which would have had to be made up into about 1,000 heavy freight trains.

IN a negro revival meeting at Mount Vernon, Ind., Noah Bishop was apparently one of the most contrite of the seekers after salvation. He was the loudest among those in the mourners' seats, and was prayed for by all the brethren. Before the close of the services he said he had received the evidence of forgiveness. Then he went out of the church, met his divorced wife with a man whom she was soon to marry, grew frenzied with jealousy and killed her with an axe.

PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM A KENTUCKY MINISTER.—Two preachers were some time ago passing Howe's old mill, on Lead creek, which was at that time sadly dilapidated. One of them remarked that the mill needed a new dam, and was horrified when his reverend brother earnestly answered: "That mill is not worth a dam." The seemingly wicked brother is now our presiding elder.—Hawesville Phileander.

THE negroes of Jackson county, Ga., are reveling in the excitement of a revival season. Here is the favorite camp-meeting song:

Forty-seben bull frog all in de row,

Hand out de dimes, or you all gwine to hell.
Bress de good Lord.

It is related that a New Hampshire minister recently portrayed the history of Jonah after the following style: "I seem to see Jonah passing along the road to Nineveh: I seem to see him enter the ticket office, buy his ticket and pay for it; I seem to see him walk upon the vessel: I seem to see them lift their anchor, and the stately ship moves grandly out upon the broad Atlantic."

IN SPEAKING of the death of "American Girl," the favorite race horse of America, which suddenly died in a race a few days ago, the Herald says: "If there is indeed a horse heaven, she has gone to it. A whole lot of new metals are found by the spectrum to exist in a gaseous state in the atmosphere of the sun. There are the vapors of hydrogen, potassium, sodium, rubidium, barium, strontium, calcium, magnesium, aluminium, iron, manganese, cobalt, nickel, titanium, lead, cadmium, zinc, copper, uranium, cerium, vanadium and palladium, and how many others are yet to be discovered we must leave to the imagination of our readers.

THE Scientific American, says if a bottle of the oil of pennyroyal is left uncorked in a room at night not a mosquito or any other bloodsucker will be found there in the morning. Mix potash with powdered meal and throw into the rat holes in a cellar, and the rats will depart. If a rat or mouse gets into your pantry, stuff in his hole a rag saturated with a solution of Cayenne pepper, and no rat or mouse will touch the rag for the purpose of opening a communication with his depot of supplies.

A HEAVY FALL.—Abbe Joseph Chabert, a prominent Catholic ecclesiastic of Montreal, and principal of the government school of art and design, was on September 25th, arrested on a charge of rape, committed on Josephine Beauchamp, a girl of fifteen years, and in his own room. Possibly his saintship had indulged too much in celibacy, until the flesh rebelled against the spirit. His trial will soon follow, but probably it will be immoral in a court to convict so good a man of so base a crime.

OLD Winston was a negro preacher in Virginia, and his ideas of theology and human nature were often very original. A gentleman thus accosted the old gentleman one Sunday: "Winston, I understand you believe every woman has seven devils. 'How can you prove it?'" "Well, sah, did you never read in de Bible how seven devils were cast out'er Mary Magalin?" "Oh, yes, I've read that." "Did you ebber hear of 'em bein' cast out of any odder woman, sah?" "No, I never did." "Well, den, all de odders got 'em yet."

MR. SLUSHEK, the largest man ever born in Tennessee died at Greenville in that State last Friday. He was but nineteen years of age, and, had he not been bent by an attack of rheumatism, would have been nine feet high. His boot was 18 inches long, and one of his hands was about the size of four ordinary ones. He could sit on a chair and pick up anything three feet from him. His head measured about 14 inches, and his chest seven and a half feet in circumference. His coffin was 8½ feet long, 28 inches wide, and 2½ feet deep.

COLOR IN DEATH.—Henry Jones, a worthy man of color in Philadelphia, bought a lot in Mount Moriah cemetery. His money was deemed as good as any man's, and was readily taken in exchange for the lot where he wished to have his bones deposited when he went the way of all the earth. But not so. He died a few days ago, and when the funeral procession was on the way to the cemetery with his body, it was stopped by order of the Christian directors and was informed that the defunct colored man could not be buried in their grounds. The pious souls could not think of the white saints lying mouldering in their graves, being contaminated by the contiguity of a man who once had African blood coursing in his veins.

The Bible God Disproved by Nature.

BY WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

[Concluded.]

Again, the Bible says death came into the world through man's sin. Science proves the utter falsity of this statement. Death is a natural law of life, inherent in the nature of all organic existences, impossible to be avoided, and was rampant in the earth millions of ages before the fabled Adam ever trod the mythical Eden. Thus we have the biological teachings of Nature dissipating the spectral Bible God.

7. PHYSIOLOGY. According to the Bible God, the following events took place with Judah, during the first forty-two years of his life: He grows up, marries and has three sons; the eldest son grows up, marries and dies; the second son marries his brother's widow and dies; the third son, after waiting to grow to maturity, declines to marry the widow; the widow then deceives Judah himself and bears him twins; one of these twins, Pharez, (from whom Jesus was descended according to Matthew) grows up and has two sons born to him, yet Judah was only forty-two years old at the end of all these transactions. (See Genesis xxxviii.) Four generations in forty-two years. Is not this manifestly absurd and impossible, contrary to established physiological laws?

Again, in less than four hundred years after the deluge, the descendants of Noah's three sons—none of whom had a child before the flood—had so multiplied that four kingdoms were engaged in war with five other kingdoms, besides over a dozen more kingdoms are mentioned as then existing. Is not this also opposed to all of Nature's physiological and reproductive laws?

Yet again, from seventy people, Jacob's family, who went into Egypt, there sprang, in two hundred and fifteen years, between two and three million people. There were only four generations, as Exodus plainly states, yet seventy people produces two millions or more in two hundred and fifteen years. There must have been forty-six children to every couple, without an exception, in each generation, yet we see in the first of the four generations, that the twelve sons of Jacob had altogether only fifty-three sons. At this rate of increase, in the fourth generation there would have been only 6,311 males, instead of over a million. Evidently a lie is out somewhere, and it don't take long to place it. The whole book of Exodus is full of falsehoods from beginning to end, as Colenso demonstrates, beyond all doubt.

Dan had only one son, yet in the fourth generation his descendants had increased to 64,400 warriors. Counting women, children, and males unable to fight, there must have been nearly 300,000 Danites. Another monstrous falsehood!

Nature renders it impossible for a man to be older than his father, yet in 2 Chronicles xxi. 20, and xxii. 1-2, we find a man's youngest son two years older than his father. And yet people cling to, and worship a book full of such rubbish, nonsense and downright lies as is this Holy Bible. Holy! Heaven save the mark!

This book plainly contradicts Nature, in stating the birth of Jesus without a human father, and the birth of Isaac when Sarah was ninety years old, when, as is plainly declared in the book, the reproductive functions had long ceased to act with her.

Also we read in the "blessed New Testament," of a certain demoniac possessed of a legion of devils. A legion in the Roman army was about three thousand men; but as these devils entered two thousand swine after being expelled from the man, we will call them two thousand, allowing one devil for each hog. In all representations of devils and demons given us by our Christian friends, they are about the size of an average man. We always see and hear of them in human form and of human size. Now we can conceive of one devil possessing or obsessing a man; but how in the name of common sense can two thousand devils enter into one poor mortal? Can devils reduce themselves in size, diminish themselves down to the size of mosquitoes and fleas, and by that means a legion of them take possession of one man? The natural history of the Bible does not give us any information on this subject; but supposing that they can so diminish themselves, I presume they would take up their abode in different parts of his anatomy; one in the mouth, one in each eye, one in each ear, one in the nose, one in each knee, one in each big toe, and one in each little toe? Poor fellow! he must have been in a sorry plight! Seriously, it is marvelous to see so many people calling themselves intelligent, swallow down such ridiculous stuff as this. Thus we see in many cases how Nature, through physiology, utterly repudiates the Bible God.

8. BOTANY. According to the so-called Mosaic record, (none of which Moses ever wrote,) all the vegetation of the earth was covered by a flood of waters, over five miles high, for over a year, yet it was not destroyed; no vegetable substances being saved in the ark, only animals. Nature declares that such a weight of water pressing upon vegetation for such an extended period, would inevitably destroy every vestige of it on the earth; that none could possibly survive; universal decay and decomposition would ensue both of plant and seed. The Bible God further declares that he cursed the ground for man's sin; causing it to produce thorns and thistles; while science proves that thorns, briars and thistles existed as plentifully in the primeval world as after the appearance of man. Wrong again, Jehovah. Wake up, please, and tell the truth sometimes! Thus the Bible God is again disproved by Nature's laws exhibited in the science of botany.

9. ZOOLOGY. The Bible God declares that the hare chews the cud, and divides not the hoof; while science emphatically affirms that it does not chew the cud, and does divide the hoof. It seems from this that our friend, the Bible God, after making the hare, entirely forgot what kind of a creature he was; not only forgot his physical conformation, but likewise the habits with which he had endowed it. Strange God! Infallible God! How we should honor and revere thee for thy matchless teachings!

"To every animal God gave every green herb for meat," says the precious volume. Really! Is this true? About as true as all the preceding biblical statements to which I have referred. From the very beginning of life on this planet, carnivorous and flesh eating animals have existed, millions of years before the appearance of man, or the fabled "fall," through which Christian theorists account for the existence of ferocious animals, poisonous reptiles, etc.; but which theory, alas, science ruthlessly demolishes, by proving that carnivorous animals existed, in even greater numbers, prior to the advent of man than since; that from the beginning of all organic life, animals have been preying upon each other, such being the order of Nature. So we see that Nature's teachings, as exemplified through zoology, distinctly disprove the Bible God.

10. ORNITHOLOGY. The Bible God, it is reported, caused 4,538,480,640 cubic yards of quails to fall around the Jewish camp, to supply them with food; enough to make a wall around the earth eight feet high and twelve feet thick, the quails being brought by a "wind from the Lord," from the sea. Science demonstrates, first, that quails are never brought from the sea; and second, that no such quantity could ever be possibly collected, at one time, in any one part of the world, or in fact, in the whole earth. Again we observe the Bible God disproved by Nature.

11. PHILOLOGY. The Bible God, as the book declares, originated the various languages of the earth by confounding the speech of the builders of Babel's Tower. Science declares language to be the result of a gradual growth from a few primitive sounds, evolved by man's dim consciousness in primeval ages, developing as man develops in civilization and enlightenment, the distinctive branches of the human family having each developed a different body of languages, as the Indo-European, or Aryan, the Semitic, the Turanian, etc. Long prior to the time of the alleged Babel confusion, various conflicting languages and dialects were in existence in different parts of the world. Such a thing as a unanimity of speech on earth, science knows nothing of, save, perhaps, in the dim and distant past when man first emerged from the animal kingdom into the strictly human. Once more is the biblical divinity repudiated by Nature's teachings.

12. GEOGRAPHY. The Bible God speaks in several places of the "four corners of the earth," the "ends of the earth," the "foundations of the earth," etc., all of which are entirely inconsistent with the spherical shape of our globe. It also speaks of Satan taking Jesus up into a high mountain, and showing him all the kingdoms of the world. A pretty high mountain that! I wonder where it is situated! As archaeological research has demonstrated the existence of kingdoms in Central America at that time, how did Jesus see, from that mountain in Asia, those kingdoms?

Genesis, likewise, speaks of the four rivers in Eden being united as one. These rivers being evidently the Euphrates, Tigris, Nile and Indus, it is geographically impossible for them ever to have been joined into one river. Thus we see that Nature, through geographical science, clearly establishes the non-existence of the Bible Deity.

13. MATHEMATICS. Mathematical certainties, you know, are the most certain of all certainties, if I may be allowed the expression, yet judged from the Bible God's standpoint, they are very uncertain. Three times one is three, is as about as sure as anything can possibly be; yet the Bible says, three times one is one. "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one," is its plain declaration. Comment is unnecessary. Speaking of the Trinity, I may here parenthetically remark, that this dogma is clearly of Pagan origin, the same idea appearing in Hindoo, Persian, and Egyptian theologies; indeed there is nothing original in Christianity or Bible religion. It can be demonstrated, beyond all doubt, that every doctrine, dogma, rite, ceremony, institution, feast day, festival, fast, and fast day, as well as every moral precept, without a single exception, has been borrowed from Paganism. The Old Testament bears as much the impress of "heathen" thought as the New, one instance of which it may be pertinent to mention. Among the ancient Egyptians, as is proved by the inscriptions upon their monuments, there was something of sacredness attached to the number 110 years. Many of their most famous kings are stated to have lived one hundred and ten years, and other instances of the sacred import of that number appear. It will be noticed that Jacob, the Hebrew Patriarch, is stated, in the Bible, to have died in Egypt, aged one hundred and ten years, the sacred number of the Egyptians, thus being transferred to Jacob.

It is a well established axiom in mathematics, that the whole must be greater than any of its parts; yet the inspired record gravely informs us that a part of five loaves and two fishes, viz.: the fragments taken up was much greater than the whole.

A hundred is usually supposed to be the tenth of a thousand; yet the "Word of God" tells us that a hundred and a thousand are the same. 2 Samuel, x. 18, says, David slew seven hundred charioteers of the Syrians. 1 Chronicles xix. 18, says he slew seven thousand, referring to the same event.

Again, three and seven are generally presumed to be different in amount, but not according to the Bible God. 2 Samuel xxiv. 13, says seven years of famine, and 1 Chron. xxi. 12, says three years of famine, alluding to the same circumstance; we thus perceive that three years and seven years are the same, according to Bible arithmetic. Mathematics thus conclusively negatives the being of the ideal biblical deity.

14. OPTICS. Genesis says God divided the light from the darkness. Nature says there is no such thing, positively considered, as darkness, it being merely the absence of light, a negative condition. If he divided one from the other, they must previously have been united, or mixed together, and what kind of light was that united to darkness? It is sheer nonsense to talk of dividing light from darkness, the veriest bosh! But you perceive our Bible God much delights in bosh. Still again is this fabulous Scripture God set aside by Nature.

15. ACOUSTICS. The Bible several times declares that Moses spoke to "all the congregation of Israel," to "all Israel," with similar phrases. It also says Joshua read the commands of Moses to "all the congregation of Israel, with the women, the little ones and the strangers conversant with them." This congregation consisted of over two million persons. How was it possible for Moses to speak to, or Joshua to read to, two million people at once? Thus, once again, does Nature deny the existence of the Jewish Jehovah.

16. METEOROLOGY. The Bible God, it is declared, made a firmament that divided the waters above the earth from the waters below and on the earth. This firmament was supposed by the Jews to be a solid arch spanning the sky, in which the sun, moon, and stars were "stuck" by God, above which was a large body of water which it, (the firmament), held up. There were, they thought, numerous little holes or windows in this firmament or heaven, which, when opened, let the water run through, thus causing the rain. There also existed, according to the Bible, a large body of water under the earth, upon which the earth rested. The Second Commandment forbade the making of any graven image of anything in the waters under the earth, hence there must have existed some kind of animals in those waters under the earth. Psalms 24. 2, says, "The earth is founded on the seas, and established on the floods." Another psalm speaks of him "who stretches out the earth above the waters." When the deluge came on the earth, the Bible says, "the fountains of the great deep were broken up," that is, the waters under the earth were let loose over the earth; "and the windows of heaven were opened," that is the coverings of the holes in the firmament were lifted, and the rain suffered to run through on the earth. Meteorological science proves that there exists no such thing as a firmament, neither windows of heaven, waters above the earth nor waters under the earth. No more need be said on that point.

Meteorological science also declares, the impossibility of there ever having been such a flood on the earth, as is described in the Bible. It is absolutely impossible for a body of water over five miles high (covering the highest mountains), to be ever held in solution in the atmosphere. If all the moisture in the atmosphere was condensed it would not cover the earth one inch. Then again, where did all the water go to when the flood abated?

The Bible God still further declares that no rain fell on the earth till after the creation of every plant and herb of the field. Impressions of rain drops, however, are found in both Silurian and Devonian rocks, laid down before plants and herbs had an existence. So much for that story.

It is also narrated, in that strictly accurate volume, that, at the request of Elijah, it failed to rain, in a certain locality where rain was accustomed to fall, for three and a half years. Science declares this an impossibility. No such thing ever did, or ever will happen. In several instances, then, does meteorological science demolish the Bible hero.

17. PNEUMATICS. The Bible God, in order to prevent men building a tower that would reach to heaven, was compelled to confound their language, when if he had only been aware of one of the simplest facts in the science of pneumatics, he need not have troubled himself about it at all. All he had to do was to let them continue building, until they reached a certain height, when the rarity of the atmosphere would have compelled them to desist, as it is impossible for men to live in the upper strata of the air. What a pity it is that God did not know this, else there would have been no confusion of tongues, and all nations would be speaking the same language, which would be far more convenient than the present medley of dialects. Nature thus again disproves the Jewish God.

18. HYDROSTATICS. Water invariably seeks its level, every one knows, yet, in Bible times, such seems not to have been the case, for we read of the Red Sea standing up like a wall each side, so the children of Israel might pass through. A manifest impossibility again.

Some biblical apologists say the deluge was only a partial one, extending over a limited tract of country, forgetting that, as water always seeks its level, a body of water five miles high would flow over the whole earth, of necessity, till an equilibrium or level be established. Thus again is the anthropomorphic Bible God dethroned by Nature.

19. MECHANICS. We read in the Bible of Aaron casting into the fire a lot of gold and jewelry, and behold! a golden calf came out, no mention being made of any mould or mechanical appliances, the inference being that the melted gold formed of itself into a calf, thus plainly contradicting one of the simplest laws of mechanics. Our biblical divinity is again supplanted by Nature.

20. CHEMISTRY. Man was made out of the dust of the ground by our Bible God, it is said, but man contains within himself numerous primitive elements not found in dust or clay, likewise dust contains silicon in considerable quantity, scarcely a trace of which can be found in man. Again the imaginary Bible God is dispelled by Nature.

21. MINERALOGY. Moses, so the story goes, ground the golden calf to powder, and sprinkling it upon the water, made the people drink it. Science declares the impossibility, in the first place, of grinding gold to powder. It may be melted, or beaten to a remarkable thinness, but cannot be pulverized. In the second place, it cannot be held in solution in water so that it may be drunk. These facts completely spoil that pretty story, and again render the Bible God a non-entity when brought in contrast with Nature.

22. PSYCHOLOGY. According to the views of the ancient Jews, and other nations, the seat of the mind was in the heart, just as the Chinese locate it in the stomach. One is as sensible as the other. So all through the Bible, the heart is spoken of as synonymous with mind, brain, intellect, affection, etc., the Bible God not having the remotest idea that the head or brains had anything to do with man's mental nature. Science now teaches the brain to be the depository of the mind or soul, not the heart. Thus, as in all other particulars, modern science establishes irrefutably the utter ignorance of the Bible Deity.

23. MILITARY SCIENCE, STRATEGY. The Bible recounts the falling of the walls of Jericho, through the blowing of rams' horns. Military science declares the story utterly baseless, since the walls of any city can only be made to fall by being battered down with the requisite projectiles, by being undermined, or by the shock of an earthquake. Hence once more, and for the last time, have I demonstrated, through Nature, the non-existence of the God under consideration.

Having brought to bear upon this fabulous monstrosity the light of some twenty-six departments of knowledge, I will now proceed, very briefly, to pay my attention to some of his attributes, sayings and doings, as recorded in his own holy word.

It has been denied that the Bible God ever sanctioned vengeance among men, or practiced it himself. Those who make the statement must be woefully ignorant of the contents of the Bible, for, all through that book is God described as a revengeful, retaliatory, vindictive, sanguinary monster. Nahum i. 2, says: "God is jealous and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies." That is plain enough in all conscience. Exodus xxxii. 27, 28, says: "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and slay every man his brother, and every man his neighbor, and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men." 1 Samuel, xv. 3, says: "Go and smite Amalek and utterly destroy all that they have; and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." And this wholesale butchery was ordered simply for what their ancestors had done, four hundred years previously. In 1 Sam. vi. 19, we are informed that God savagely killed 50,070 wheat-reapers in the valley, because they looked into the ark. And what was the ark? A trumpery old box, an idol of the Jews, revered by them as sacred, like the car of Jugernaut by the Hindoos. That was a pretty extensive wheat field in the valley in which fifty thousand men could be reaping it at one time!

Again, as the ark was being borne along, the oxen jostled it, and Uzzah steadied it with his hand, and the Lord became mad with anger, it says, and killed him on the spot. Comment is unnecessary upon such fiendish deeds. Scores of other passages might be referred to, but time does not admit. Indeed, of all the cruel, blood-thirsty, sanguinary, malignant, ferocious, diabolical and infernal fiends and monsters of which the human mind has ever conceived, the Bible God is the most devilish and diabolical. Of course he is a mere figment of the Jewish imagination, a nonentity, but were it possible for such a despicable fiend to exist, no language would be capable of depicting the utter loathing and contempt such a wretch would necessarily inspire, in all men and women of kindly sympathies, generous impulses, and a keen sense of justice.

The Bible God is also guilty of wholesale lying and deceit. 2 Thess. ii. 11, says: "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned." In Ezekiel xiv. 9, the Lord declares that if a prophet be deceived in speaking a thing, he, the Lord God, has deceived that prophet. In Num. xiv. 30, the Lord tells the children of Israel that they shall not come into the land which he swore he would give them to dwell in, and in the thirty-fourth verse he acknowledges his breach of promise in the matter. Here God is a perjurer, liar and a trickster altogether. In Deut. xxviii. 68, the Lord says he will bring the Israelites into Egypt again by the way he spoke to them they should see it no more again, thus breaking his word in true Jehovah fashion. Any number of similar passages might be quoted, in fact this Bible God was one of the most persistent and clumsy liars of which we have any record. Peace be to his ashes! Poor defunct! Science and Freethought have killed him!

This God, however, seems to have been as good at repenting as at lying, for we find numerous cases of his indulging in that delectable pastime—fit occupation for a God! It repented him that he had made man, and it grieved him at his heart. Poor fellow! It repented him that he had made Saul king. He repented, on several occasions, of the evil he thought of doing the Israelites in the wilderness. He repented of the evil he had intended to bring upon Nineveh; and in Jeremiah xv. 6, he says, in despair, he is weary with repenting. No wonder! Poor, childish God! He did not know his own mind for an hour at a time.

The injustice and partiality of the Bible God are so glaringly apparent, it is scarcely necessary to mention any cases thereof. See, however, Deut. vii. 6; 1 Kings iii. 12; Malachi i. 2, 3; Rom. ix. 15, and Deut. xiv. 21.

The immoral teachings given to men by the Bible God are fearfully conspicuous. In Deut. xiv. 26, he commanded the people to buy, with the money obtained through selling tithes, whatsoever their soul lusteth after, wine or strong drink. In Prov. xxxi. 6, 7, he directs that strong drink be given to him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts. Let them drink and forget their poverty, and remember their misery no more. These passages are as plain exhortations to intemperance and drunkenness as can possibly be expressed in language.

We also find robbery, vagabondism, polygamy, prostitution, debauchery, adultery, degradation and enslavement of women, slavery and the slave trade, tyranny and oppression, all enjoined in the Bible. Virtue and learning are discouraged, and vice and ignorance encouraged. Breach of faith, lying and hypocrisy are also encouraged. Persecution unto death for opinion's sake, is expressly commanded. Suicide is recommended in Prov. xxiii. 1, 2. Wholesale murder and assassination are commanded and rewarded on numerous occasions. If I had time, I could quote verse and chapter for every statement herein made.

Moreover, the most nonsensical language often appears in the Bible; for instance, Luke ix. 18, says: "When Jesus was alone, praying, his disciples were with him." How could he be alone, and they with him? In Isaiah vii. 20, we read: "The Lord shall shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by those beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head and the hair of the feet, and it shall also consume the beard." There's crudition for you. A dozen "Philadelphia lawyers" could not make any sense out of that.

In different parts of the Bible we find God variously described, thus: As a gardener (Gen. ii. 8); a tailor (Gen. iii. 21); a mid-wife (Gen. xxix. 31); a house-builder (Ex. i. 21); a slave-dealer (Joel iii. 8); a fool (1 Cor. i. 25); a butcher (Isa. xxxiv. 6); a schoolmaster (Isa. liv. 13); a sexton (Deut. xxxiv. 6); a stone-mason (Ex. xxxii. 16); a shoemaker (Ezek. xvi. 10); a potter (Isa. xiv. 8); a doctor (Jer. xxx. 17); a barber (Isa. vii. 20); a cook (Acts x. 15); and a candlestick-maker (Ex. xxxi. 6-8).

Numerous prophecies of the Bible God have also totally failed to come to pass. The prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel concerning Tyre, Babylon, Egypt, etc., have all failed long ago, as could easily be demonstrated, did opportunity afford. Christ's prophecy of the end of the world taking place in that generation, and his declaration that there were some standing by his side who should not taste death till he came in his kingdom, have never been verified. Eighteen hundred years have rolled away, and yet no wind-up of things mundane; no Son of Man sitting on a cloud; no Gabriel with his trumpet; no saints caught up in the air! Verily, our Bible God should have managed a little better than that! His "only begotten son" a false prophet! Who then can we trust?

In conclusion, it is only necessary to state that the Bible probably contains more contradictions, absurdities, inconsistencies, fabulous legends, rhapsodical nonsense and unmitigated rubbish than any book the world ever saw, and its author, the idolized Bible God, must be of similar character to the book. "By their fruits shall ye know them." All I have to say is, that if God can not write a better book than the Bible, he had better "shut up shop," sell out to some one who can do better, and never attempt another book. One such dire failure is enough.

To sum up, this God of the Bible is "a God who raised up enemies that he might conquer them. (Exodus ix. 15-16); made promises that he might break them, (1 Samuel ii. 30-31); caused moral diseases that he might cure them, (Romans xi. 32); and permitted his favorite people to go after other Gods, that he might butcher them.—Numbers xxv. 2-4.

A God who was before time was, (Psalms 5, 6, xc. 2), cogitating before there was anything to cogitate about—made the Universe before there was anything to make it out of, and did before there was anything to do.—John i. 3.

A God who formed man in his own image, though his own image had no form, (Genesis i. 27; John iv. 24), created an author of all evil, though not himself the author of any evil, (Genesis iii. 1; James i. 13), and caused his creatures to commit the most abominable crimes, and suffer the intensest agonies, though not himself the cause of either criminality or agony.—Isaiah xlii. 16-18; Hosea xlii. 16.

A God who saw that the work he had performed was very good, yet presently discovered that it was very bad, (Gen. vi. 7),—foreknew that man would sin, yet was indignantly astonished that he did sin, (Gen. vi. 5-6), foreknew that the forbidden fruit would be eaten, yet damned the whole human race because it was eaten—Gen. iii. 15.

A God who, though always in all places, occasionally came down from Heaven, just to see how the world wagged, (Gen. xi. 5; xviii. 21); though always of the same opinion, occasionally changed his mind, (Gen. vi. 6; Jonah iii. 10; though in good temper, occasionally in a thundering passion, (1 Sam. vi. 19; Numb. xxv. 4); though always merciful to perfection, occasionally murdering millions of innocent beings, (Exodus xi. 4-5); and though without parts, did, upon a particular occasion, show his back parts.—Exodus xxxiii. 23.

A God so deceptive as to send upon his people "strong delusions" that they might believe a lie, (2 Thess. ii. 11-12); so very silly as to suffer himself to be "checkmated by the Devil," (Gen. iii. 4-5); and so atrociously cruel, that no human tyrant could ever equal him in brutal wickedness.—Jeremiah xlii. 14; 1 Sam. xv. 2-3.

A God whose presence would make a hell of heaven, (Heb. xii. 29); whose virtues are vices, (Exodus xx. 5; Psalms vii. 11); whose reasons would disgrace an idiot, (Exodus xxi. 21); whose laws would shock a savage, (Numbers xv. 30-35); whose fickleness provokes derision, (Jer. xv. 6); and whose whole character is a horrible compound, "an intense concentration" of the worst vices which have stained the worst human natures.—Exodus xxxii. 27; Ezekiel xiv. 9; 1 Kings xxii. 21-22.

This is the God of the Bible—mankind behold him! look at him with wonder and astonishment!—behold that All Wise Being who made man upright, yet could not keep him so, (Eccl. vii. 29),—made the Devil, yet could not control him, (1 Peter v. viii),—made all things pure, yet could not preserve them from corruption, (2 Peter iii. vii),—that All Powerful Being who damned countless millions, for the innocent error of an individual, (Isaiah xlii. 27, 28),—destroyed by the Deluge "every living soul," because of their wickedness, except two or three living souls, who begat a second race as wicked as the first, (Gen. vii. 23, Numb. xiv. 20),—provides an eternal heaven for the fools who accept, and an eternal hell for the wise who reject his "holy Gospel," (John iii. 36, Mark xvi. 16),—that Divine Being, who, after begetting himself upon somebody else, (Luke i. 35), sent himself to be a mediator between himself and somebody else, (John iii. 17), and after being derided, spurned, hated, laughed at, scourged, and nailed to the cross, got himself decently buried, as a preliminary to mounting once more to the right hand of himself, (Acts x. 39, 42),—that Amiable Being, whose history should be written in blood, for it is a bloody history,—whose name inspires disgust, for it is the name of an imaginary fiend, and whose religion should be universally execrated, for it is the religion of horror, (Zeph. i. 17, Heb. ix. 52, Jer. xlii. 13, 14, Lam. iv. 8-11).

Away, then, with this Bible God! Away, then, with this atrocious Trinity, Omnipotent God, unnatural son, and voluptuous ghost! Away with all such brutalizing phantoms, in whose name priests rule with a rod of iron, oppress and persecute, upon the principle that the oppressed and persecuted in this world, shall, by their phantoms be made happy in the next; fit us for heaven by making us unfit for earth; make us wise unto salvation, by making us foolish unto destruction; purify our thoughts, by teaching us that we cannot possibly think a good thought; exalt our courage, by denouncing terrible punishments upon those who do not "fear God with trembling; in whose name priests "damn to the lowest depths of hell" the scoffers at these soul-saving doctrines, the exposure of their body-plundering practices, and the depisers of their sanctified errors."—Godology, By Thomas Patterson.

Thinking, the God of the Bible has been sufficiently disproved by Nature, Science, Reason, and Common Sense, I bid you farewell.

The Ills we Endure, their Cause and Cure.

Through extreme selfishness, undue greed, unrestrained avarice, obtuse ignorance, a mistaken theology, an excessive fondness for show and glitter, and a love of aristocracy and caste, this poor world of ours—and more especially this fair country—is far less happy than it ought to be. It should be a HEAVEN, and might be, but man has made it almost a HELL.

Through a misdirected policy and a defective system of civilization, this land, which should be in every sense of the word a land of plenty and happiness, is with many a land of poverty and want. We see riches, affluence and splendor on one hand, and destitution, disease, wretchedness and starvation on the other.

It is painful, in this great city of New York, to walk around in the aristocratic portions of the metropolis and view the magnificent palaces of the rich, where all is grandeur and ostentation, where so much wealth is lavished for mere display and show, and then to turn our steps to the haunts—the dwelling places—of the poor, the toilers, the unfortunate ones of the community, who are forced to crowd into dingy attics, damp, noisome cellars, into badly-constructed and over-crowded tenement houses, often twenty, thirty and fifty families, even, in one badly-constructed building—luxury, plenty and pride on the one hand, and desolation, discomfort and squalor on the other. The contrast is striking and most appalling. In a large proportion of cases it is found that those who wearily toil the greatest number of hours in the twenty-four, sustain the greatest deprivations, and live on the plainest kind of food. The extremes between wealth and poverty are probably greater in this city than in most parts of the country, but the contrasts are much the same all over the country. As it is here, it is nearly everywhere.

It is melancholy to realize that, in this "land of plenty," where no individual should suffer for the want of food, that starvation absolutely takes place. There is far too much enforced idleness. It is not unfrequently the case in this one city, that there are from fifty to one hundred thousands that cannot find employment by which to secure the necessities of life. It is a crying evil that a man, seeking employment—upon which the existence of himself and family depend—is unable to find it. Our laws protect the rich man in every dollar of the millions he has ground out of the labor of the toiling masses, and it is due to the poor man as well, that he has equal protection. His labor is his capital, and this should be guaranteed him as really as the rich man with his gold and his ill-gotten gains.

There is a most serious defect in the Christian civilization of our times. It has sadly failed to extend happiness and plenty to the masses. A large proportion of the people of this country, of unequalled advantages, are to-day groaning under poverty, deprivation, destitution and want. It is not as it should be. With the productiveness of our soil, with the increased knowledge that has been acquired in the various avocations and the varied conditions of life, all ought to have plenty, all ought to be happy. If the labor and the wealth were fairly apportioned, there would be none excessively rich; none excessively poor. Six hours of labor in twenty-four would be sufficient to afford a comfortable living for all, and none need famish with hunger.

The selfishness of our kind, the faults of our religion, and the aristocracies we have to support, are chargeable with a great share of the evils under which we groan. If we could exchange seventy-five per cent. of the selfishness we cherish in our breasts, and let a true feeling of humanity, a love of our race fill its place; or, if we could cause our selfishness to become so enlightened as to show us that the best interests of individuals is most promoted by the well-being and prosperity of the masses, it would be vastly better for all concerned. In a family of ten children, where the larger proportion are healthy and capable of getting along in the world; if a brother or sister from ill-health, imbecility or want of capacity, evinces an inability to grapple with the trials and difficulties of life, the kind-hearted brothers and sisters who are more fortunate, will take an interest in them, will aid them, will help them along, and will divide with them, if necessary.

This is the sentiment that should actuate all of us. We are one large family. All humanity are our brothers and sisters. We should not try to pull each other down, nor to rise upon others' misfortunes and disabilities; but it should be the duty and the pleasure of all to make those around them prosperous, contented and happy. Excessive selfishness is the bane of our existence.

The aristocracies that have to be sustained are oppressive and expensive. First, perhaps, in this country, comes the aristocracy of wealth. Gold, and the love of it, rules the country. The capitalist wields an influence and power not easily computed. One excessively wealthy man, like a Vanderbilt, a Stewart or a Scott is able to control and oppress thousands of his equally deserving, but less fortunate fellow-beings. The rule of wealth and capital is a most fearful despotism which the world would be happy in suppressing. The tendency is for this gigantic evil to increase, and it is doing so in geometrical progression. The rich men to-day are vastly richer than twenty-five and fifty years ago, while the poor are much poorer, and vastly more numerous.

If this state of things continues but a very few decades longer, the rich will become monied lords, comparatively few in number, while the millions will be abject slaves, menials and dependents. This is upon the supposition that the masses do not inform themselves of their rights and take the means of redress into their own hands.

The aristocracy of knowledge is not so much to be dreaded, but still it exists to a very great extent. The number of educated, well-informed people are in far too small a minority, and their power is by no means inconsiderable. Ignorance still fills the land, and though a large majority know how to read and write, the general information that should, like the rays of light, overspread the land, is, unhappily, fearfully deficient. It is, however, a cheering indication that knowledge is increasing. With each succeeding generation it is to be hoped some gain in this direction is made upon the preceding generation. But much remains to yet be done. The world needs a great deal more of light, to dispel the great mass of existing ignorance and error. A happy fact in this direction is, that any person and every person can acquire as much knowledge as he pleases without impoverishing another or lessening the grand aggregate.

The aristocracy of the Priesthood is indeed a fearful one—an aristocracy that rules the world by working upon the fears and the ignorance of its dupes, and the more dangerous because of its insidious, presumptuous, arrogant, and exacting character. It claims a delegated power from a king in heaven, and it has for thousands of years ruled the world with a rod of iron, and with fire and the sword. Millions of treasure have been wrung from ignorant and confiding dupes by this greedy, oppressive aristocracy, and though they have made pompous claims to morality, they have doubtless been the greatest curses the earth has known.

An eloquent and distinguished teacher in the Liberal ranks has given utterance to this sentiment: "We are satisfied there can be but little liberty on earth while men worship a tyrant in heaven;" and he might have added: and but little little liberty and independence while men sustain a licentious, pampered, polluting priesthood.

An approximate estimate of the expense of this theological aristocracy can be arrived at when we take into consideration that in Christendom there are 600,000 priests that are wholly non-producers and who live solely upon the labor of others, laying their exactions upon the toiling masses with a heavy, merciless hand. In our own country there are sixty thousand clergymen, and scarcely one in the entire number do as much as to grow a hill of beans. Their salaries vary from $500 and $1000 to $10,000 and $20,000. There are also sixty thousand churches to be kept up, many of these temples to the unknown God in the cities of our land, costing from $50,000 to $500,000 each, and some even more. Many of these churches are supplied with expensive organs, and high-salaried choirs are employed. The Christian religion costs this country $200,000,000 annually and the question naturally arises, are the returns in proportion to the cost? Truth answers no, no, NO! It is definitely settled that the religion alluded to does not increase morality where it prevails. In no part of the world is there so much cheating, lying, stealing, robbing, killing, grinding the face of the poor, trampling upon the helpless and needy, as in Christian lands. Christian despots, Christian lords, Christian millionaires, Christian capitalists, are more oppressive, more cruel, more exacting than any others in the world.

Reader, think for a moment how it is. The sixty thousand clergymen of this country and their families are supported in idleness by the laboring classes; for all the rich, all the idle, all the indolent, and all the aristocrats live and flourish by the muscle and sweat of the toiling millions. Every drone, every non-producer, every one who adds nothing to the wealth and products of the world are supported and fed by those who labor. Suppose every priest, every clergyman who now feeds upon the best the earth produces, but without lifting a finger towards producing it, suppose by the power of public sentiment or other controlling influence they were themselves compelled to become producers—if by the labor of their hands they were made to feed themselves and their families, just think what a burden would be taken off the shoulders of the weary toilers. If the clerical aristocracy, if the monied aristocracy, if all the drones and idlers were forced to feed themselves, to support themselves and to clothe themselves, what a relief it would be to the working men and women who not only are now forced to feed themselves, but all the drones in the great human hive. If the labor of the world could be equally apportioned, as we observed, six hours of toil in the twenty-four would be sufficient to sustain every person in comfort and plenty, and the remaining eighteen hours could be passed in recreation, mental improvement and rest.

It is fortunate that the remedy of the ills we endure is mainly in our own hands. What we need is the intelligence, the humanity, the love of our fellows and the unselfishness to co-operate and work for the general good instead of personal aggrandizement, and excessive wealth. The laboring masses must learn to co-operate with intelligence and unselfishness. It is impossible to limit the great good that can be accomplished by it. With the ballot, with the muscle, with the habits of industry, and with the resolution and perseverance of the working men and women the greatest results can be produced. The laboring classes have in their own hands the making of officers and law-makers, and consequently the laws. If they will work together with due intelligence they can compel the conditions as they please.

If certain laws are desirable to be enacted, they have the power to elect the men to enact them. If capitalists are bearing down upon the working poor, let the laboring class bring their power and influence to bear and command the terms. If the owners of mills and factories, as at Fall River, are oppressive and unreasonable, let one hundred and fifty men, more or less, of the operatives work in a united interest putting in $100 apiece, or what they are able to do, and inaugurate a business, on a moderate scale, if necessary, and be their own masters. An honest and practical co-operation in cases of this kind can hardly prove unsuccessful, and will apply to nearly all the avocations of life—in buying for consumption and in selling the products of labor. Co-operation is success. ful in many parts of Europe and is becoming somewhat so here; and in this direction lies the remedy for many of the ills endured by the working millions. To make it a success a fraternal feeling, an enlightened intellect, faithful honesty and practical effort are the essentials.

Our attention has recently been attracted to a co-operative movement at Springfield, Vt., known as "The Industrial Works," that furnishes all its members with constant work at fair wages and a pleasant home at small cost, and which is meeting with a success so marked as to attract the attention of many thinking people. The members of this association are said to be young people who are willing to rid themselves of bad habits, work steadily, dress economically, and save a portion of their wages. No others are taken.

The men who join are required to furnish a small amount of capital, and to save one fourth of their wages which must be invested in the capital stock of the company. Women are not required to put in capital, but to save one sixth of their wages and to invest it in the business. Those who do not comply with the requirements of the association are expelled, and those who wish to leave can do so at any time and can withdraw their capital by giving a few months notice. The wages paid to each member is fixed by a board of directors and is apportioned to skill and ability.

They have a large dwelling or home, where the members live and enjoy many privileges and comforts not attainable by the poor in the ordinary course of life, whether in small families or boarding-houses. All pay a moderate price for board from their wages.

They have two new factory buildings and a good water privilege and considerable machinery; and are engaged in the manufacture of toy and house-furnishing goods, for which ready sale is found.

They commenced business a year ago with five hands, and are now working forty-five. Their sales for last month were over $3,000. Their pay-roll for the month was over $1,200, and the saving of wages which was added to the capital of the company was more than $300. The average amount saved from the wages of each man in a year is $150, and of each woman, $50. Many of the members have saved more than this amount, but this is all that is required of them. The aggregate amount saved by the present company will be about $5,000 for the year. By continuing in this course for a few years, the capital of the association must become large, and the earning of each member a respectable and comfortable competency.

Such a co-operation of industrious, honest and intelligent individuals, may certainly be practical and very successful. It is a subject upon which we shall have more to say. The success which has attended the combined operations of the societies of "Shakers," "and the Oneida Community," establish the fact, that not only in union is there strength, but that in union and co-operation is there sociality, pleasure and profit.

There are various ways in which the principle of co-operation can be applied. If it is not desirable in all cases to enter into companies in the manner just indicated, it can at least be carried out in the election of officers, and in the enactment of desirable laws. The laboring men of this country may be the rulers of this country if they choose to be so. They have only to act in concert and with discretion, to accomplish anything they wish. We urge them to an unselfish humanitarianism, or in other words, an enlightened self-interest. Let the great truth be always borne in mind, that by promoting the general welfare and happiness, we most effectually promote our own. Let this principle be acted upon and carried out in all the affairs of life, and vastly more can be accomplished for the happiness and good of the race, than the Church, religion, and all the priests have effected, for thousands of years.

We would briefly indicate, just here, the course, that to us seems feasible for employing the thousands who are unable to find employment themselves; that the municipalities, the State, or organized companies for the purpose, establish a series of manufactories and industrial establishments, where any person can find employment, at any time. Let fifty or seventy-five per cent of the wages earned from week to week be paid, the balance to stand for six months to be then paid, or to be invested in the capital of the company for the benefit of the individual. This would be vastly better than that unemployed thousands should be left to crowd our cities and indulge in crime. A reasonable amount of capital invested in this way, would be vastly better than establishing soup houses and alms-houses; and an immense saving would thereby be induced in cost of trials and courts of justice for the punishment of criminals. Labor, even, at moderate pay, is a blessing to those wanting bread.

Our prisons should also be made industrial institutions, and every person unwilling to work and who has no visible means of livelihood, should be arrested and made to work for no remuneration save plain board.

In a word employment, at moderate wages, should be furnished all who want it, and those who will not work should be made to. This course would end most of the tramps, idleness, and crime that now abound, and the average hours of toil would be lessened for all classes. Now the workers have to support all the idlers. If the idlers were also compelled to work, the laborers would assuredly have to devote fewer hours to toil.

The insatiable and insane desire for excessive wealth, which is one of the great evils of our time, should be counteracted by excessive taxation upon the excessively rich. No man has ever honestly earned a million dollars, and he really has no right to it. Wealth is the common property of the world, and a few individuals have no right to engross it all. We say then, tax the immensely rich, heavily, and in a ratio increasing with their wealth. Say on $50,000, one per cent.; 100,000, two per cent.; $500,000 five per cent.; $1,000,000 and over, ten per cent., or at all events, such a rate of taxation as will render excessive wealth undesirable, thus leaving it to flow in the usual business currents, and attainable in a moderate degree by the masses.

Large land-owners should be treated in a similar way. No man has a natural, or just right to more land than he can use, and the excess above this quantity should be so heavily taxed that he would be glad to part with it and to throw it into the market, where men of moderate means can obtain it.

The people have these reforms within their power, if they will but intelligently use the power they possess.

Our remarks, however, are already too extended. We must defer the further consideration of these and cognate subjects, including money and finance, to future articles.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Brooklyn Revival.

Brothers Moody and Sankey are daily and nightly holding forth in the Skating Rink in our sister city, and with voices worn and hoarse they are still shout- and calling upon souls to "come to Jesus." Over $10,000 have already been expended in the enterprise. For the amount of money expended, the number of clergymen in daily attendance, the ostentation and display, the attention called to it by the daily press, it surpasses all revivals which have preceded it, but whether the result is to prove a financial or a substantial success, is more than doubtful.

Many are attracted by idle curiosity; many go to hear Sankey's excellent singing; and others imagine by going there they will, for an hour or two, get a little nearer to Jesus than they could be elsewhere, and thus, perhaps, make amends for the short-comings and mis-deeds they have been guilty of.

From the accounts of reporters, Moody is not a very able man. He is rather coarse and unlettered and tells his stereotyped stories over and over again in an inelegant manner. Some of his allusions to the Deity are also said to smack of irreverence and are common-place.

He is reported to have claimed that he converted seventeen Infidels in Edinburgh; and one among the number was the president or chairman of a Free-thinkers' Association. We were not there, and of course cannot speak by the card, but it is our opinion that there is a lie out in the matter. If he is so potent at converting Infidels why don't he try his hand upon some in these parts? At 335 Broadway, for instance, is a hardened and fearless Infidel who has not prayed for many years, and has very slight faith in the saving efficacy of Christ's blood or any other man's, and is more than anxious to be converted to the truth, if he already has not found it. Come on, Brother Moody; don't despise small game; we will meet you fairly and "argue the case" with you. If you can convert us to your ancient fables all right, and we will join in the song of "Moses and the Lamb;" but if we, on the other hand, can show you that your system is all a cheat and a fraud, and that you are engaged in a business that is really disreputable and ever ought to be, we want you to forsake it forever.

Is it not really a ridiculous farce for men of education and talent—and scores of them for that matter—to stand up and harangue gaping crowds of simple people, which reach thousands in numbers, about the machinations of the Devil, the anger of Deity, the great efficacy of blood as a propitiation and a saving element, the eternal purposes of a God being frustrated by the wiles of the evil one, and the imminent and everlasting destruction that awaits the human race.

Is it not pitiable to see men and women who ought to have better sense, to quake, and fear, and tremble, under such silly ravings—to cry out in terror as though a terrible impending danger was just ready to overtake them, and the wrath of heaven just ready to fall upon them, when they frantically call to this clergyman and that pastor, (who are very possibly deeper in sin than they are) to pray for them?

Do these objects of pity really suppose God has changed, that there is a particle more of danger to be apprehended from God or from the Devil, now, than a week ago, a month ago, or a year ago, and that there is the slightest cause for alarm, more now, than before they entered the Rink?

This miserable tomfoolery is what is called "getting religion," and in our opinion, the more a person gets of it the worse off he is, and the more fool he is. Is it really not about time that intellectual beings should be fed on a different kind of pabulum, that the reason should be appealed to instead of the fears, the ignorance, the superstition, the emotions, and passions, and that such men as Moody and Sankey should be able to find some more useful employment than frightening old women in petticoats and in pants, out of the little sense they have left?

Although many call for prayers we do not learn that the number of the converted is very great. When all the smoke of the excitement has blown away, we apprehend a scarred, arid field will be left, and that the converts of the hour will relapse back into the crooked, winding ways they have heretofore walked in.

O! for a revival of reason, of truth and common-sense. May it spread over the land and visit every man and woman, and make them children of LIGHT and TRUTH. AMEN.

THE BURGESS-UNDERWOOD DEBATE, AND THE PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION.—Both these works will be ready to send out about the 20th inst. We have been delayed some by the stereotypers, printers and binders; but our friends will not have much longer to wait. Let us again urge all our friends to order a copy of each, and thus render us a little aid. They are cheap, and a slight amount of money will buy them. THE DEBATE, 180 pages, 60 cents in paper, and $1.00 in cloth. PRO AND CON, 150 pages, 40 cents in paper, and 75 cents in cloth; sent postage paid. Who next says he will take a copy of each?

Political Freethought.

BY M. STEIN.

Universal suffrage exercised by the sovereign people of the United States, is a beautiful thing if looked at from a distance, say, for instance, from the other side of the Atlantic, where monarchy and more or less absolutism sits on the throne by the grace of God, to rule the subjects which for hundreds of years have been transferred from father to son, subjects in the tame meaning of the word, ruled alternately by wise and good men, by virtuous and vicious women, by idiotic and demoralized kings, all by the grace of God. Here we are ruled by governors of states and by the "Great Father" in Washington, elected by the vote of the people and kept in power for only a short time.

Universal suffrage in its widest sense is somewhat like the elements. Fire and water, when properly used, are beneficial to humanity, if left uncontrolled they will prove to be our greatest enemies and destroyers. Universal suffrage, as at present carried out in this country, will eventually destroy our liberties, ruin our republican institutions and bring about a revolution, which will compel the better class of our citizens to put down by main force the ignorant rabble that as part of the sovereign people has been accustomed for years to think that brutal power can elect corruption to the seats of governors, judges, state and city officers. To any reader who may think that these conclusions are exaggerated, we beg to propose the following questions. Do we always see in the results of an election the expression of the wish and will of the majority of the people, or of the more intellectual, the more honest and moral members of society? Does not the minority always include a great many upright men, that have fought for some sound principles? Does it not now require a Diogenes to look up a true statesman? The type of the men that a hundred years ago framed and signed our constitution, seems to be lost, and therefore it is not to be wondered at that the memory of an honest president like Lincoln, and of a noble and able statesman like Seward, is celebrated by the erection of monuments. This, although it proves that there are exceptions to the general standard of politicians, it at the same time proves that these exceptions are so scarce as to make them worthy of delivery to the growing generation in stone, marble or bronze. Our average politician knowing that no statuary is in store for him, wisely concludes to have his memory celebrated during life-time by figuring in paint on political banners and posters, by playing a conspicuous part in target excursions and rum-shop brawls, and by furnishing his own rockets, powder, and calcium lights. In some few exceptional cases the memory of prominent political men is transferred to the coming generation by the criminal records or by free lodgings in the penitentiary or states prison.

The modern politician, as a rule, is a prominent church member, because he knows the Church to be a power; that a connection with it covers a great many sins, and that he can repay any favor granted by the church, by voting away the people's money for sectarian purposes. Would it have been possible for the political thieves that ruled this State and city, to have acquired and kept themselves in power if the church, and especially the infallible one, had not supported them by crilling the uneducated, brutal adherents of priestcraft to come and vote in a phalanx for the installation of corrupt candidates? When once in power, how easy it proved for these low-bred politicians to vote away millions of the people's money for the erection of sectarian schools, which are the true breeding places of bigotry, ignorance and pauperism, and in opposition to our public schools.

The Church will flourish most profusely under two kinds of government, under a liberal and absolute monarchy, as in England and Russia, or under a corrupt government, as in the United States. In the first cases the Church and State are one, they depend upon one another, and therefore support one another, in the other case the Church is at liberty to fanaticise, manipulate and command millions of uneducated, bigoted and willing tools to vote according to its dictates. A noble government, free from corruption, independent and just, would cripple the power of the Church by abolishing the many privileges, freedom from taxation, granting of millions of money for sectarian institutions, etc., now enjoyed without the shadow of right and justice.

If Moody, who is at present peddling out cheap salvation for the masses at the Brooklyn Bink, was a New York priest, he would have evinced more policy than he did the other night. He was weighing off sinners, old and young of both sexes; they all proved too light, so that in each case part of Christ had to be thrown in to balance the scales. Salvation by this process proved so far very easy, until a prominent Brooklyn politician was got hold of, when it was found out that a whole Christ was not even enough to balance him, and the peddler had to throw in a holy ghost in the bargain.

New York is the worst ruled of all the cities in the Universe, and it is astonishing with what indifference the tax-payers look on, when they are robbed in open daylight by a mob of political vagabonds! What a set of men are masters of this city; what a band of robbers dispose of the money wrung from property-owners and indirectly from tenants alike! What a disgrace to decency and common sense to see the benches of district courts, police courts, and sometimes those of the higher tribunals, occupied by degraded men, companions of thieves and gamblers, men without any knowledge of law, and whose education is a mere sham! What an insult to common sense to have the majority of the judges and the recorder elected by the vote of the people, the criminal classes, and future candidates for the States prison included!

The corruption in Albany is proverbial, is talked of as a matter of fact, and the expression "lobby and lobbying" has found a steady place in our language. Suits for lobby services are openly brought before our courts in the same way as butchers' or grocers' bills. Albany is the high school for political aspirants—the place they "run" for—and it would gladden the heart of an artist if he could draw the picture of a defeated candidate for the Assembly, who expected to fill his pockets, after the last dollar is gone for election, whiskey and Chinese lanterns, and now stands there an object of pity, compelled to take up the spade and borrow or deal out poison from behind the bar of a public rum-shop patronized by statesmen in embryo. The word "ring" in its political meaning is true American. Rings are profitable to its own links, but expensive to outsiders; they are costly luxuries for cities, counties and States. Look for instance at the New York City ring, and see what price the city paid for the luxury. The ring possessed absolute power over the city, established an irresponsible and autocratic system of government. The debts amounted, Jan. 1st, 1869, to $36,293,929; up to the year 1870, it was increased $11,739,812; during 1870, $25,339,810 were added, and during eight months following, an increase of $24,000,000 took place; all these figures were added to the bonded debts during a few years.

Although nobody will deny that the majority of our citizens are law-abiding, orderly, well-meaning and honest, everybody must confess that the better classes of our citizens are totally indifferent in matters of public interest and reform. A good many well-meaning people waste their energies in reform movements of a doubtful character; temperance movements that know no limits to fanatical measures, religious revivals that will bring no lasting good, begging and squandering away money for the conversion of so-called heathens, distribution of thousands of Bibles and millions of trashy tracts, fighting pauperism by means that will only encourage the very evil which they intend to conquer.

The object of our merchants and professional men is mainly to make money; they will pay any amount of taxes as long as they individually can make money enough out of their neighbors to pay the bills. To strike at the root of a bad government is troublesome, to be indifferent is easy and offends nobody. If we were asked to propose a plan for a general political and social reform, we only could repeat what we have written on this subject some eight years ago. Restrict the power of the President to prevent him from removing able officers of an out-going administration and filling their places by political favorites, that are often totally unfit for the position. "Make hay while the sun shines," expresses at present, too often, the principles of government officers, that expect their discharge in course of a few years for no other cause than a change in the political horizon. Abolish the useless and costly ornament called the Senate. Pay your representatives in the Legislature and in Congress a good salary and make them work for the money. Let at least two-thirds of the officers be appointed for life or a long term, especially all the judges and make them responsible for their actions. Give to the minority a proportionate representation. Extend the right of suffrage to intelligent women. Separate the State from the Church in the true meaning of the word by taxing church property and withholding state or city support from all and every sectarian institution. Church members will then be free to vote for the best man regardless of future consideration for their benefit. Do not allow any newspaper to attack candidates with malice, slander and foul language, because it has a demoralizing influence on the masses of the people. Establish courts of arbitration wherever advisable, it will reduce the number of political shysters aspiring for positions with the expectation to share in robbing the people.

Above all things reform the election process by excluding all persons that are morally unfit to vote, abolish the voting cattle, but on the other side compel every person entitled to vote to do his duty, under penalty of the law. The latter proposition can be carried out easier than the reader may imagine. It is absurdity if the individual in a republican community thinks that he can escape responsibility for the existing evils by withholding his vote. The passive or silent element in politics, is no less dangerous than the one that votes for the wrong man. Indifference is the stumbling block of reform.

We are opposed to know-nothingism because it is contrary to cosmopolitan ideas, but manufacturing of voting cattle, as carried on in this country, is a disgrace to the American citizens, an insult to the men that framed the constitution of the country. Ignorant Irishmen that cannot read nor write, uneducated Germans unable to speak the language of the country, Frenchmen and Italians not in the least acquainted with the country, its language and its institutions, ignorant negroes and mongolians are turned into voting cattle by thousands, to be used as tools by political factions. A man that cannot read or write or that cannot read and express himself with ease in the language of the country, has no right to decide upon questions of political importance.

State and city know how to collect personal taxes and how to summon citizens for jury duty. Can they not act in the same way for the purpose of voting at elections? Have blanks printed containing the usual questions put at the registering places, let them be distributed, and let every voter answer on these blanks the questions in his own handwriting. The voter takes this paper to the polls, where his name is kept on record, he deposits his vote, or part of it, or he may, in exceptional cases, even withhold his vote from either of two candidates, when a coupon attached to above mentioned blank is torn off, stamped and handed back to him to enable him to prove at any time that he has performed his duty. A challenge would not require any foolish oath, as pen and ink could decide on the spot if the paper and handwriting were genuine or not.

In calling attention to the existing political evils of our country, we do not pretend to have said anything new or unknown to the reader. Parsons and priests have been preaching their doctrines for eighteen hundred years, the same old stories every year, with the exception that now and then they exchange their bundles of sermons; if their flocks do not become tired of their repetitions, you may well afford to forgive the writer.

Contrivance does not Prove Design.

BY JOHN SYPHERS.

What do men mean when they talk about design in nature? Let us philosophically consider this question for a short time in the light of reason and science. Design is a mechanical term which men have invented to represent the doings of their own hands. When the term is applied to the things of nature, it has no meaning nor applicability, and will mislead the mind every time. There may be an adaptation of means to ends in the inventions of men, and this adaptation they may call design, but in nature there is no such thing. The general constitution and frame-work of nature may be built up in any promiscuous manner whatever, or according to any plan whatever, or according to no plan whatever, and the human mind being developed in accordance with that system, it will seem full of design to that mind.

The great question of standard comes in here, and so long as the mind tries any system or arrangement, no matter how heterogeneous and promiscuous it may be by itself, it will look to be and seem to be crammed chock full of design and adaptation, so much so, indeed, that men, in their superficial reasoning, will declare that they can plainly see that this thing was made for this purpose, and that thing for that, when the fact is, there was no designer in the mechanical sense whatever. If the whole frame-work of nature had been right the opposite of what it is, men would discover just as much design in it as they now do in the present system of things. Why so? Simply because the mind would then be developed in accordance with that system, whatever it might be, and know nothing else. They would know nothing else, and have no other standard by which to compare things. When men have no standard, but measure themselves by themselves, of course then everything will tally strictly with that system, and men call this design, and thus fool themselves with an injudicious use of their own terms. If the trees had grown in nature with their tops in the ground and the roots upward in the heavens; if pumpkins had grown on great oak trees, and little acorns on the slim pumpkin vines, then we would be hearing men talking about acorn vines instead of pumpkin vines, or if the human body had had no joints in the arms or limbs, or if we had two faces and a pair of eyes on the back side of the head as well as on the fore side, then men would see just as much design in that system of things as they do now, and perhaps a great deal more. Theologians would be just as loud-mouthed in their praise of him who they supposed framed that beautiful system of things in which means were so beautifully adapted to ends, as they are now, not being sharp enough to see through the sophistry of their own argument and fallacious reasonings.

THERE IS NO DESIGN IN NATURE, consequently no big mechanic as a designer. That old mechanical argument and idea is now exploded and become obsolete. Design is a term which men hatched up in describing their own operations here on the earth, and it will mislead every time when applied anywhere else. Talk about a world of chance! This is nothing more nor less than a world of chance, although the word chance is not just the right word to use in speaking on this subject. Yes, this is a world of chance, and a very slim chance at that! It is a world of heterogeneous promiscuousness. The system and order, harmony and design that men think they see, exists only in the mind.

Look how promiscuously the stars are scattered over the blue vault of heaven. No more arrangement or order in them, than there is in the seeds that fall from the hand of the sower; yet the human mind, when it brings to bear the faculty called order upon them, will see the shapes of animals there, which they call constellations. Pléiades, Hyades, Leo, Ursa Major, Ursa Minor etc. This heterogeneous conglomeration of stars, is all resolved into order and taught in a science called the geography of the heavens. Yet really, there is no order there—all is promiscuity, just so with the great and universal system of nature. The human mind conceives order and apparent design, where there really is none.

Astronomers talk learnedly of the twelve signs of the zodiac. They speak of the Bull, the Lion, the Ram and the Bear, yet there is, in fact, no such arrangement of those stars. It is wholly an ideal conception. The human mind has worked out so much order and design from this great fountain of heterogeneity, that we could not study astronomy nor write intelligently upon that subject without it. This should teach us the great philosophical lesson, that, what we call order and design, are creatures of the mind alone, and do not exist in nature at all. If one of the inhabitants of Jupiter was to make a flying visit to this world, I should not wonder nor be the least surprised if he would almost laugh himself to death, to see our system of things here. Everything would look to him like one great conglomeration of heterogeneous, lawless chance. His mirth would be increased ten-fold if he should ever chance to hear one of our Doctors of Divinity fulminate and boast of the great design and adaptation which they think they see in everything around them here. He would smile when he looked around upon this half made world, where heterogeneity sits enthroned upon all things. He could see no two things exactly alike. No two faces exactly of the same shape and feature—no two people of the same size and height—no two flowers alike, no two trees alike, no two hills or mountains of the same size and height, no two stars of the same size, color, brilliancy and glory—no two rivers of the same length, and no two streams running in the same direction. Everything to him would be full of chance. He would see that here men might be sick and die at any moment. Here we know not when it will be clear or cloudy, cold or warm. But in Jupiter they know all these things, for there everything is regulated by fixed laws; nothing is left to chance. He would remark, no doubt, that here men and women seemed to be about half made, having only one pair of eyes and a face on one side of the head, while in Jupiter they have a pair of eyes on both sides of the head, and they can walk backward or forward at any moment, without having to turn the whole body clear around as we do. No chance there to slip up behind and knock a man's head off and he not see the approach.

He continues, "you have a sophistry which is popular among your theologians and logicians, here, that contrivance proves design." This argument arises from pure ignorance. Contrivance can prove nothing. The old argument of the watch is only a plausible sophistry. If man had no help from any source, he might look at, and study the mechanism of the first watch he ever saw until his hair was as grey as a rat, and his head as big as a bushel, and he never would even suspect what it was made for. If a man could live long enough to study a watch a thousand years, and at the end of that time, the watchmaker was to step up to him and say, "sir, that is a machine by which I measure time," he would no doubt, burst out into a loud laugh and haw haw, crying out "crazy again." "Is there any man fool enough to believe that such an intangible, imponderable and immaterial thing as time, can be measured by a machine?" A very little study will make it plain to the mind of any man, who is not a bigot or an imbecile, that no man can ever tell or even guess the use of any machine without assistance from the inventor. No machine or watch can tell their own story. Then away goes the old argument of a thousand years standing, that contrivance proves design. I will give any man one hundred dollars for every model in the United States Patent Office, which he has never seen nor heard of before, the true use of which he will tell merely by a study of its mechanical contrivance! How long do you suppose it would take an Indian to study out what a rail road engine was made for, merely from its contrivance; or a corn sheller, or a piano? I would not be the least afraid to make the offer to any of our boasting, self-conceited, clerical friends, for I am sure that I could stall them, and that too, on a machine not more complicated than a cow-catcher, a Jews harp, or even a fish hook! Men do not think nor reason on these things, at least not very profoundly, or they would soon see what an immense amount of guessing it would take to tell the use of even so simple a thing as a fish hook! (i. e., provided they had never seen nor heard of one before). The fact is, when men argue about contrivance proving design, and design proving a designer, they do not know what they are talking about; they are ignorant of their own ignorance and are not sharp enough to see it.

Worlds and systems of worlds forming this mighty Universe, never came into being by the hands of big mechanics, whom heathens call Gods. Worlds in their present form and shape, were evolved by the force of inherent laws, which always belonged to Matter. But short-sighted men will argue that things must have a beginning, and they must have an end also. Behold, I tell you a secret. That beginning and that end which you think you so plainly see, is nothing more nor less than the beginning and end of your mind! The human mind in its present development can only go out in either direction but a little ways. Aggregation and segregation are at least two of the great laws that pervade Matter. Attraction will bring kindred particles of Matter together in an organic body, and hold them there for a longer time, but finally the law of repulsion becomes stronger than the law of attraction, and then segregation or disintegration takes place.

Worlds were never made, finished up and completed in a few days or hours, as old ignorance affirms ours was; but incalculable, millions, billions and trillions of ages, has even our own little one horse world been in forming, and yet it is not finished, for creation, or rather aggregation, is still going on. Our world will continue to grow until the laws of aggregation have fully exhausted themselves, and then the laws of disintegration will set in, and the good that will have been ultimated by the long process of building up and taking down a world, will be carried forward into the great spirit world beyond. The ultimatum and elimination of spirit, is the great design in the aggregation of Matter into worlds in the first place. The old heathenistic idea of a big man, called God, making not only this world, but the sun, moon and stars, was perhaps the very best that the ancients in their low estate could do. They had as yet no science nor philosophy to guide them; but were governed almost wholly by the imagination, and hence we could not expect anything else but that we would have some big mistakes left as a legacy by them, for us to correct. But now, men's greatest condemnation is, that scientific light has come into the world, and old fogies love darkness rather than light; but for what reason, I know not, unless, perhaps it is because their minds are evil.

There cannot be a law without a law giver, cries the sophist. As far as human and man-made statutes are concerned, that may be correct; but the remark will not apply when we speak of the laws of Nature. Heat, light, motion, gravity, affinity, attraction, repulsion, &c., &c., are some of the laws of Nature. How could they be created? How little and insignificant must that sophist feel, who would apply to them the same arguments and mode of reasoning, that he would apply to the Legislature of Illinois! "But the Universe and its laws cannot be self-existent." What's the reason it cannot? You claim that the big God who made it, is self-existent. Is it not just as easy for one to be self-existent as the other? If Nature with her laws, must have a big being for a creator, designer and law giver, then we demand that your God, whom you in your ignorance pretend to know so much about, must have a creator, designer and law giver also. Here I spring a trap and a dead-fall upon the clergy, and I defy the smartest of them ever to crawl from under it. Nature and the Universe must have a creator; but that creator, who must of course be greater than that Universe, can get along without any!

Oh consistency! thou art a jewel, but how seldom found among the bogus and brassy jewelry owned and worn by the clergy! Oh glorious and beautiful star-eyed science, the world's only savior and redeemer; save us from ourselves and redeem us from ignorance and send darkness and superstition howling from the world!

When shouts of loud triumph
Will sound o'er the sea,
That priestcraft is fallen,
And now the world's free!

Stop My Paper.

MR. EDITOR: I choose this heading for the purpose of giving a short lecture to that class of bigots who profess to be Liberals, and are not willing that any person should differ with them in belief—Liberality, with a vengeance. Such Liberals are worse than the worst Christian bigots in the world, because bigotry is part of his creed, and true liberality is the reverse of his creed, and is the foundation of liberality. What right has a professed Liberal to condemn any man for his opinions, and then ask any man to respect his own? I have been a subscriber to your paper for about two years, and to the Boston Investigator for about thirty years, and I have seen so much fault finding among professed Liberals (I will not say Liberals,) because there had been something printed which did not suit their particular belief, and would stop their paper in consequence, that I have felt called upon to give my views in the matter. And I understand you have recently been converted to Spiritualism, and I have seen some fault finding articles with you, because the same evidence which convinced you would not convince them. Now, Mr. Editor, let me say to you, I am a Materialist of the rankest kind. I do not believe in any spirit, only as the result of natural organization. But as you do not measure my wheat in your half-bushel, neither do I measure your wheat in my half-bushel. I have no fault to find. Judging from your paper, I believe you are a true Liberal in every sense of the word, and I wish to say that any person who cannot fully endorse your platform, and also that of the Investigator is not a Liberal, and is not fit to class himself among them, and the sooner he drops the name the better for the cause. If you have become a Spiritualist, I cannot discover that you are any less liberal, and if it were possible for you to become a Methodist, and still retain your liberality, I should think no less of you. I am the president of the Whiteside County Liberal Association, and as I saw an article a short time ago in your paper in regard to the Rev. Mr. Hunt and an indignation meeting held at Morristown, and as the writer made the statement that the indignation meeting was largely attended by the Liberals, I will say that he was mistaken, as there was only one of our members present at said meeting, and the Chairman and Secretary were professed Christians. I wrote an article at the time of the said meeting, in condemnation of said meeting and sent it to the county paper for publication, but the editors would not publish it on account of their bread and butter. If I can get it back, I will send it to you, to show you that the Liberals did not approve of their acts. JAMES M. PRATT.

The Story of the Cross Simply Stated.

A book is put into our hands when children, called the Bible, the purport of whose history is briefly this: That God made the earth in six days, and planted a delightful garden, in which he placed the first pair of human beings. In the midst of the garden, he planted a tree, whose fruit, although within their reach, they were forbidden to touch. That the devil, in the shape of a snake, persuaded them to eat of this fruit; in consequence of which God, condemned both of them and their posterity, yet unborn, to satisfy his justice by their eternal misery. That four thousand years after these events (the human race in the meanwhile having gone unredeemed to perdition), God engendered with the betrothed wife of a carpenter in Judea (whose virginity was nevertheless uninjured), and begot a son whose name was Jesus Christ, and who was crucified and died, in order that no more men might be devoted to hell-fire, he bearing the burden of his father's displeasure, by proxy. The book states, in addition, that the soul of whoever disbelieves his sacrifice will be burned with everlasting fire. During many ages of misery and darkness this story gained implicit belief; but at length men arose who suspected that it was a fable and imposture, and that Jesus Christ, so far from being a God, was only a man like themselves. But a numerous set of men, who derive and still derive immense emoluments from this opinion, in the shape of a popular belief, told the vulgar, that if they did not believe in the Bible they would be damned to all eternity; and burned, imprisoned, and poisoned all the unbiassed and thoughtful enquirers who arose. They still oppress them, so far as the people, now become more enlightened, will allow. The belief in all that the Bible contains is called Christianity. A Roman Governor of Judea, at the instance of a priest-led mob, crucified a man called Jesus, 1,840 years ago. He was a man of pure life, who desired to rescue his countrymen from the tyranny of their barbarous and degrading superstitions. The common fate of all who desire to benefit mankind awaited him. The rabble, at the instigation of the priests, demanded his death, although his very judge made public acknowledgment of his innocence. Jesus was sacrificed to the honor of that God with whom he was afterwards confounded. Whilst the one is a hypocritical demon, who announces himself as the God of compassion and peace, even whilst he stretches forth his blood-red hand with the sword of discord to waste the earth, and having confessedly devised the scheme of desolation from eternity; the other stands in the foremost list of heroes who have died in the glorious martyrdom of liberty, and have braved torture, contempt, and poverty, in the cause of suffering humanity.

"I will beget a son, and he shall bear
The sins of all the world; he shall arise,
In an unnoticed corner of the earth,
And there shall die upon the cross, and purge
The universal crime; so that the few
On whom my grace descends, those who are marked
As vessels to the honor of their God,
May credit this strange sacrifice, and save
Their souls alive; millions shall live and die,
Who ne'er shall call upon their Savior's name,
But, unredeemed, go to the gaping grave.
Thousands shall deem it an old woman's tale.
Such as the nurses frighten babes withal;
These, in a gulf of anguish and of flame,
Shall curse their reprobation endlessly,
Yet ten-fold pangs shall force them to avow,
Even on their beds of torment, where they howl,
My honor and the justice of their doom."

Boston has property and buildings devoted to religious, educational, and charitable purposes, valued at nearly $20,000,000, which are exempt from taxation, one ward alone having $5,000,000 worth of such property. As at the regular rate of taxation these structures would yield the city at least $275,000 per annum; a movement is on foot to abolish the exemption clause in the law.

Editors' Notes.

TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS AND LEAFLETS.—We are receiving a good many orders for them, and we assure our readers it affords us much pleasure to send them over the land, knowing as we do, that they are capable of doing much good. We believe every person who has received them from us are fully satisfied. Let those who have not ordered some of them, make up their minds to do so. We send them post paid, at very reasonable prices. See List on last page.

WE THANK those kind friends who have lately remitted us their dues for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for the ensuing year. They have done their share in helping us to bear the burden that rests upon our shoulders, and they are entitled to our gratitude. Let us once more gently hint to those who are yet in arrears, that we will still be very glad if they will do likewise. Have you not put it off, and deferred it, and made excuses long enough? If you will all send in the little amounts due to us, we will agree to talk about something else.

“THE WORLD’S SAGES, INFIDELS AND THINKERS.”
—The orders for this valuable work are coming in every day, and we are progressing moderately in its preparation; but we would be glad to receive orders from large numbers who have not yet written us. Friends, don’t be afraid to order. We ask no money till the work is ready, and it only costs $3.00, and it will be cheap at $5.00. Reader, if you have not notified us you will take a copy, let us request you to do so, before you sleep again.

Volume III:

Two numbers after this completes VOLUME II, when we start out, we trust, under favorable auspices, with VOLUME III as a WEEKLY. Many have written they would send us in a good list of new subscribers for the new Volume. This is to notify all such, that they need not wait for the New Year, before remitting. For two DOLLARS sent now, we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER thirteen months, including December, 1875. It will thus be seen, that all who remit us the amount of a year's subscription within the next thirty days, will obtain THE TRUTH SEEKER one month extra.

Now we are very anxious that our list should grow largely with the new volume when it becomes a Weekly, and though we have made the price so low that it is impossible to throw off much to clubs or getters-up of clubs, we will, nevertheless, offer the following inducements:

To those who send us three names for a year's subscription to the Weekly TRUTH SEEKER, we will send one dollars worth of Tracts, or a bound copy of TRUTH SEEKER VOL. I., as he may elect.

To those who will send in five new names for a year, we will send Vol. I, II, and III of TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS (in paper), containing 1,500 pages of the best Liberal reading matter in the world.

To those who will send in seven new names for a year, we will send Vols. I, II, and III of TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS (1,500 pages), neatly bound in cloth, or a bound copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER Vol. II. for sixteen months.

To those who send in ten new names for a year, we will send a copy of our forthcoming valuable work "THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS, AND THINKERS," of over 800 pages, and which we are proud to think will be one of the best books ever issued from the Liberal press.

To those who will send us fifteen new names for a year, we will send a copy, each, of THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS AND THINKERS; THE BURGESS-UNDERWOOD DEBATE; AND E. E. GUILD'S PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION.

To those who will send in twenty new names for a year, we will send a copy, each, of Vols. I., II. and III. of TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS; THE WORLD'S SAGES, &c.; BURGESS-UNDERWOOD DEBATE, and PRO AND CON.

To those who will send us twenty-five new names for a year, we will send all mentioned in the last proposition and add a copy, each, of THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH, and Vol. I. and Vol. II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, bound.

There friends, is something to work for. Who will not do all in his power to double the List of THE TRUTH SEEKER? The world is groping in darkness and needs its light. If every patron will use his efforts to swell our list, it can easily be doubled before the first of January. In many localities, three, five and ten times as many copies should be taken as are now sent there, and thereby securing for its patrons the best paper of the kind yet published.

If you cannot induce new subscribers to remit for a year, try them for six months. If they hesitate for that term, persuade them to send for three months. Price of the WEEKLY, postage paid, $2.00 per year six months, $1.00. Three months, 50 cents.

Let all orders be accompanied with the cash in draft on New York, postal order, or in registered letter, and let the names of the orders be "Legion."

The Grand Plan of Salvation.

Christianity teaches, that after an eternity spent without employment and without a companion, God, in the space of six days, made this world and the trillions of other worlds and suns that fill immensity, with all existing forms of life; and among the rest he made man to be happy and to glorify his name; that he planted a garden in which he placed man with slight knowledge and no experience. In the center of this garden he planted a tree bearing beautiful and tempting fruit, but which possessed qualities worse than the most deadly poison. As he knew all things, he was necessarily aware what the consequences would be—he knew man would eat this fruit; but, apparently, to make it more certain, he suffered the Devil, whom he had also created, to assume the form of a snake, and to lure and tempt man to taste the fair, but fatal fruit. Weak and uninformed as he was, man fell into the snare thus laid for him—he tasted and died. By this most unfortunate transaction, man not only brought death and the eternal wrath of God upon himself, but also upon the quintillions of his descendants who have since lived. Herein is manifested the great love and kindness of God. To plan the conditions so that this result, by any possibility could occur, argues a want of power or of goodness on the part of God.

In this first experiment which God tried, his adversary completely circumvented him and wrested the world of mankind from his grasp ; but as it was in keeping with the programme laid down, perhaps the pair were mutually suited. A few centuries passed, during which the Devil constantly gained upon God and became the governing spirit among men. This caused God to heartily repent in his heart that he had made man ; and to wrest him from the custody of the Devil, he sent an immense flood which submerged the whole earth and drowned every man and everything that had life, save the cargo of one boat. All this, however, availed nothing. Mankind still did wickedly and the Devil had supreme control. This conflict between God and his Devil continued thousands of years, but the Devil was invariably triumphant and victor in every struggle. Poor man was the victim. For doing what it was designed he should do, he incurred the eternal enmity of God and was doomed to endless punishment in hell.

To gain an advantage over his adversary—to give a chance for a portion of humanity to escape its awful doom and to make it possible that he could forgive man—God at length carried out the grand scheme which he had decided upon four thousand years before; to came down from heaven and be born of a woman, to renew the bitter conflict with his enemy, with new weapons and new tactics. He overshadowed a young Jewish maiden and "got her in the family way," or in other words, he entered her womb, and at the expiration of the usual time, nine months, he came forth a healthy boy-baby-god, who was both father and son to himself. This boy-god grew up to manhood and worked with his step-father at the carpenters' trade till he was thirty years of age, when he took up preaching and working miracles. Two years, however, had not elapsed, before his old enemy, the Devil, incited certain parties to put this God to an ignominious death, and all in keeping with the pre-ordained plan of God.

The philosophy of this sublime plan of salvation is about in this wise: God made man and placed within his reach a deadly poison which he knew he would eat, and also made a Devil to assist in the fatal error. For this offense, God damned man forever, and could not possibly forgive him, unless he took himself the penalty and in his own person—unless he took the fatal blow he had aimed at man, thus striking himself to satisfy himself, and to induce himself to pardon man for what he could not help doing with the divine Devil to lead him on. But even after God put himself or his son to death, the Devil was not conquered. He is to-day, as lively and as active as ever. The world is under his control, and thousands are daily going to hell despite all that God has done to himself.

This is the great plan of salvation which priests loudly extol and call upon us to accept. Is it not most beautiful?

Friendly Suggestion.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 18th, 1875.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Permit me to express my unqualified thanks for the able manner THE TRUTH SEEKER is conducted, and for the amount of useful information you present to its readers in each number.

I am pleased it is your intention to make it a Weekly and would suggest to keep it the same size as it is now, being, I think, a very nice size for binding, and I think none of your subscribers will object, if you charge three dollars or four per year for it.

The Liberalists of England donate a fixed amount of money, according to their means, to Mr. Bradlaugh, to be used by him as a propaganda fund for lectures etc., delivered in places where there are Liberalists who want lectures, but from their poverty, are unable to compensate lecturers.

I would like such a fund established by THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I shall be most willing to contribute to it, knowing it will be the means of bringing men and women to a "true knowledge of God."

Let us hear from other Freethinkers what they think of such a plan of salvation.

Yours Truly, • AJAX.

REPLY.—It is not our purpose to increase the size of our paper so as to be unwieldy. The size decided upon, is the same as Harper's Weekly and several others. We think differently from our friend about our subscribers not being unwilling to pay three or four dollars a year for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Many of them seem very unwilling to pay the present price, or are very slow about doing it. We think a paper furnished at a low price will have the widest circulation and give the best satisfaction. Our wish is to furnish a first class Weekly at so low a price, that nearly every Liberal in the country, may feel disposed to take it and pay for it willingly and promptly. It would seem that every lover of truth and every hater of superstition and shams, ought to feel a little pride that such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER are sustained and have a wide circulation; but it cannot be done by apathy and a holding back—too penurious to spend a dime in the cause of truth. We would be glad if the Liberalists of America would follow the example of the Liberalists of England, as our friend suggests. A fund is really needed for the promulgation of Radical philosophy and truths. We daily feel the need of it, and heartily wish, the Liberalists of America were more willing to do a trifle, for the cause they love. We would say, let every man, who is free, and wants to see others so, subscribe for the TRUTH SEEKER, and distribute, among his neighbors, TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS, and TRUTH SEEKER LEAFLETS. If this is done, our cause will prosper, and our triumph will be assured.

Another Appeal.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

DEAR READERS, FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT:

Again we appeal to you, and entreat your substantial sympathy, your encouragement and support. Let it be ours to make THE TRUTH SEEKER an institution. Individuals come and go, and change overmasters all; but institutions outlast the flesh of their founders, and live on through the coming and going generations. Let us contribute our combined influence toward making this TRUTH SEEKER such a power in print as will testify for Truth, after we shall have passed away. Let us so rig out this staunch little iron clad, that it will sweep destruction among the rotten old orthodox hulks which are to-day lazily rocking, creed anchored, upon the ebbing tides of superstition. All the shot and shell of the Christian fleet will rain as unavailing against its truth-mailed ribs, as the pellets of a boy's pop gun against Gibraltar. But its furnaces must be fed, its steam kept up. Little green paper slips furnish the fuel for its propelling power. The fires smoulder, and the wheels rest and rust, when the paper fuel is lacking.

Dear friends, it is the many and many of these little slips constantly coming in from all your several pockets that will enable this little cruiser to triumphantly outstride the financial breakers, which have whelmed the many hundreds of more pretentious crafts within the last few months.

Perhaps you do not realize the cost of journalism, or the embarrassments attending such enterprises as those in which the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is now engaged. The change of THE TRUTH SEEKER to a Weekly, the publication of Tracts and Leaflets, together with the expensive work, such as he proposes to issue, all at this particularly unpropitious time, make it imperatively necessary that all who wish him success, all who feel an interest in the dissemination of Liberal literature, should promptly render him their support at this critical juncture.

The names of twenty-five hundred delinquents are upon his subscription list to-day. The prompt payment of these arrearages would place THE TRUTH SEEKER in a prosperous condition, and enable its worthy editor to prosecute with renewed zeal, his welcome work.

As a class, we are poor. Opposed to us are Mrs. Grundy, the Almighty Dollar, and all the wealth and power of the conscienceless Christian Church.

In the darkest hour of the revolutionary struggle, Thomas Paine pledged his every dollar upon a subscription list for the suffering soldiers. The example of his sublime individual efforts inspired the colonies to carry the contest on to victory. They emancipated themselves and us from the rule of a "royal brute of Britain." To-day we are seeking to guard the right of conscience from a deadlier foe than ever sat on England's throne. And it is only by co-operation and self-sacrifice that the champions of Freethought, to-day, can hope to do their duty. Each individual may do something for the Liberal cause; may circulate a few Tracts or Leaflets, obtain a new subscriber, or induce an old one to renew. At least, those in arrears should pay their just dues; and all should realize that every little push helps carry onward the car of Progress.

The "Friendly Correspondence" in THE TRUTH SEEKER indicates the absolute demand for such a print, and the place it occupies in the hearts of its patrons. It has now become a necessity to the majority of its readers, and the Liberal public must maintain it. And not all the demons and devils, nor ghosts and gods, nor Christs and churches and Comstocks, can crush it, if its friends will prove true Liberals—liberals in pocket as well as in ideas, and will properly sustain it.

The sole aim of its editor, is to give to the world the cheapest and most effective radical reading matter. For illustration, Ingersoll's Lectures, complete, a work costing $2.24, by mail, is furnished by him in tract form for 30 cents. Those who are personally acquainted with him, are aware that he is enabled to publish at the surprisingly low rates he does, only by the most economical business management, and the most self-sacrificing devotion to the interests of his patrons and the cause he advocates. Seeking to strike off the cursed shackles of creed and ignorance from his soul-fettered fellows, he is contented to perform his thankless task; to work unweariedly with heart and hand, with brain and pen and muscle, sixteen hours out of each day's twenty-four, and to still struggle on against the most disheartening circumstances. Those fully acquainted with his surroundings, appreciate his efforts, and trust that time hath reward in store for him. Many of his friends would persuade him to leave THE TRUTH SEEKER for the lecture field. He is fully assured that the latter pursuit would be far more profitable and pleasant, than his present position. But convinced as he is, that THE TRUTH SEEKER has an especial mission in the great domain of theological and scientific investigation, no mere considerations of profit or pleasure will ever induce him to abandon it. All he has, is invested in the enterprise; all he has, all he is, and all he hopes to be, are unreservedly devoted to the work he has undertaken. But it is evident that a radical paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER, entirely unsupported as it is by friendly capital, must needs seek something more substantial than Truth if it escape the fate of so many others in these unhappy times.

And now, Liberal Friends, consider whether there be another Freethought journal in America to-day, that could supply the place of THE TRUTH SEEKER; consider that a certain number of cash-paying subscribers are absolutely essential to its continuation, and that no paper can afford to have the names of two or three thousand delinquents on its subscription list; consider what a jubilee it would occasion in the Christian camp, were we to suffer this staunch little sheet to languish for lack of necessary support, and what an everlasting stigma such a result would attach to the very name of LIBERAL. We entreat you, Brothers, earnestly consider this, and send in your remittances without delay.

Unwilling to meet the Issue.

BEDFORD, IND., Oct., 14th, 1875.

ELDER JAMES M. MATHES, Pres't Bedford College.

Dear Sir: Mr B. F. Underwood is here, delivering a series of "Freehought" lectures, and is willing to meet you in a public discussion, on the issue of "Freehought" and the Christian Theology. It is believed by the Freethought element there, that discussion would be profitably advantageous; and as you are a representative man of your church in Indiana, (and doubtless of the West), we can see no substantial reason why you should decline engaging in a public debate with Mr Underwood. He has debated with your best minds, Burgess, Braden, Russell, and others of your theological school. If you prefer, you may select Messrs Trent, Sweeney, Burgess, or any other competent representative man of Christianity. If you conclude to accept our invitation, we can then arrange the preliminaries, number of sessions, etc. We confidently hope that you will accept this challenge and communicate the same to us at your earliest convenience.

We are very truly yours.

N. L. HALL.

R. L. ROUT.

J. D. THOMASSON.

WM. A. LAND.

BEDFORD, IND., Oct. 15th, 1875.

MESSRS. R. D. ROUT, N. L. HALL, J. D. THOMASSON, AND W. A. LAND.

Gents: I have the honor to acknowledge this receipt of your very kind and courteous letter of 14th inst., covering a challenge for a public discussion with Mr. B. F. Underwood, of the issues between the Bible and your belief. You tell me that you think that such a debate would do much good in this community and is much needed, &c.

In answer, I will say, that I am prepared to admit, that your champion, Mr. Underwood, is a gentleman and a scholar, and possesses superior ability, both as a debater and lecturer. And I may also admit that you are honest in your unbelief. Still I do not admit that there is any necessity for such a debate in Bedford.

First. Because the Infidel elements in this community is only as one in a hundred of the citizens, and therefore too small to make such a debate interesting.

Second. Mr. Underwood has met some of our strong men, and the issues involved, have been as thoroughly discussed as we could hope to do it; and all that is likely to be gained by such discussions has already been brought out, time and again. Why then repeat it in a community where you have nothing to lose—let the matter go as it may—where your defeat even to you would be victory?

Third. Debating is one of the means adopted by Mr. Underwood and his school of unbelief, to gain notoriety, and to publish their unbeliefs to the crowds, who otherwise would not go to hear them. I decline being a partner with him in such a meeting. Our fathers and mothers believed and loved the Bible, and died in the glorious hope of eternal life beyond the graves, inspired by its divine teachings, and we are satisfied with the Bible as the word of God.

Fourth. I am told that you want to have fun, and think that it would be funny, to have the debates you propose, and hear a poor mortal impiously assail the character and teachings of the Redeemer of the world, and trample under his feet the blood of the Savior of mankind.

Now it occurs to me that there could be no fun in this. I want no fun of that sort. The subject is too solemn and awful, for fun!

But I have said enough. You now understand me, and while feeling myself fully prepared and able to defend the Bible against the attacks of unbelievers of every school, whenever, in my judgment, such defenses becomes necessary, I most respectfully decline to accept your challenge.

I am most respectfully yours,

J. M. MATHES.

BEDFORD, IND., Oct. 16th, 1875.

ELDER JAMES M. MATHES, Pres. Bedford College,

Dear Sir: We are in receipt of your favor of yesterday, in reply to our invitation to meet Mr. Underwood in public debate. We regret that you have decided not to engage in a public discussion in this town. Knowing that you belong to a denomination that was born and reared and matured in controversy with other sects, and that public debate is one of the means employed by your ministers to get your news accepted by the people, we were not prepared to believe that you would decline to meet Mr. Underwood, a gentleman of ability, culture and reputation. We are glad to see, however, that you do not resort to a method too frequently employed, of deprecating an opponent in order to diminish the importance of the views he advocates.

You think the Infidel element here so small that it is not worth while to engage in debate with Mr. Underwood, its representative. It is true, this is a stronghold of your faith, but the Infidel element in this community is probably larger than you have been led to suspect. There are probably more infidels and skeptics in this community than there are members of your Christian Church, not to speak of those whose minds are filled with doubt, and who are looking for arguments to fortify them in that belief, which, despite themselves, is growing weaker and weaker every day. The notion that the Infidels here are as one to a hundred, is quite incorrect, and simply shows that in your devotion to your faith, your eyes are closed to the real danger that threatens your Church. But even if the number of Infidels here are as small as you say, provided a debate would be favorable to the truth as you profess to believe, would not that small number be sufficient to warrant a discussion?

Mr. Underwood, we can assure you, does not seek discussion merely for notoriety. It is true, he endeavors by debate to get the attendance of those who could not otherwise be induced to listen to his reasoning. Is this not quite as true of the ministers of your denomination? Have they not sought controversy with the Methodists for the same purpose?

You are pleased to say "our fathers and mothers believed and loved the Bible." But is that any reason that we should believe in the divine origin of the Bible? Were not our fathers and mothers fallible erring creatures like ourselves? Did they not have many errors and superstitions that we have outgrown? Might not the Buddhist or Mohammedan make the same statement in support of his faith, when urged to investigate by the Christian missionary? Indeed did not the pagans of old say the same of their religion when called upon to embrace Christianity? We are not aware that mere "fun" is the object of any Infidel in this community in wishing a debate. We agree with you that the subject is a serious one, and is entitled to earnest and candid thought and courteous discussion.

Our object in requesting you to debate with Mr. Underwood, is to give the public an opportunity to hear the arguments and reasonings of two men of opposite views, who have given much time and thought to the subject of religion. Your supposition that Mr. Underwood would "impiously assail the character and teachings of the Redeemer, and trample under feet the blood of the Savior," is entirely gratuitous and shows how unjustly, though unintentionally, we hope you judge him in advance. On the whole we cannot help thinking your reasons for declining to meet Mr. Underwood, are weak and insufficient, however satisfactory to yourself.

But through the efforts of Mr. Underwood and others, we look for an increase of the Infidel element in this community. The tendency of the age is that way, we think, and orthodox conservatism in this town cannot resist it. We hope, therefore, that you or some other minister will be forced by candid and liberal public sentiment, to engage in a debate on the Bible and the Christian religion.

We have the honor to be very truly yours,

A. N. HALL.

PRENTISS.

THE Methodist congregation in Frankfort Hill, N. Y. quarreled about the location of the organ in their church. One faction assembled to move the instrument by force, and were so energetic in their work that it was badly damaged. It is nightly expected that the other party will try to put it back in its old place, and if the attempt should be made, a fight is anticipated.

The Book-keeper's Dream.

The day had wearily come to its close.
And night had come down with its needed repose,
As a book-keeper wended his way from the store,
Glad that his toilsome hours were o'er.

The night was cheerless, and dismal and damp.
And the flickering flame of the dim street lamp
Went out in the wild rough gusts that beat
With furious speed through the gloomy street.

Tired and cold, with pain-throbbing head,
He sank to repose in his lonely bed:
Still through his brain, as the book-keeper slept,
Visions of debtor and creditor crept.

The great balance sheet he had finished that day,
And profit and loss, in the usual way,
Showed how much money the merchant had made
Or lost on the preceding twelve months' trade.

And he dreamed that night that an angel came
With the ledger of life, and against his name
Were charges, till there was no room to spare,
And nothing whatever was credited there.

There was life and its blessings, as intellect, health,
There were charges of time, opportunities, wealth,
Of talents for good, of friendship the best,
Of nourishment, joy, affliction and rest.

And hundreds of others, and each one as great,
All with interest accrued from the time of their date,
Till despairing of ever being able to pay,
The book-keeper shrank from the angel away.

But the angel declared the account must be paid,
And protested, it could not be longer delayed.
The book-keeper sighed and began to deplore,
How meagre the treasure he'd laid up in store.

He would cheerfully render all he had acquired,
And his note on demand, for the balance, if desired.
Then quickly the angel took paper and wrote
The following as an acceptable note:

On demand, without grace, from the close of to-day,
For value received, I promise to pay
To him who has kept me, and everywhere
Has guarded my soul with infinite care,

Whose blessings outnumber the drops of the ocean,
While living, the sum of my heart's best devotion;
In witness whereof, to be seen by all men,
I affix the great seal of the soul's amen.

The book-keeper added his name to the note,
While the angel across the great ledger page wrote
In letters as crimson as human gore,
Settled in full, and was seen no more.

Paine Memorial Hall.

A STATEMENT BY G. L. HENDERSON.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Many of your readers are also readers of the Boston Investigator, and have contributed sums of money toward the Paine Memorial Hall of Boston; and whether they have contributed money or not, they are interested in every movement whose object is to unite upon a plan of organization which will ultimately furnish Temples of Reason in every city, village, and township in the United States, with trained reasoners capable of filling them, and performing the functions which the teachers of Superstition are either unable or unwilling to perform.

About four years ago, I read with pleasure a notice in the Investigator, that five trustees had been selected to receive subscriptions for the purpose of erecting a Paine Memorial Hall. This made the enterprise popular, and it was indeed appropriate that the name of the author of "The Age of Reason" should be associated with the first temple dedicated to Reason. Boston being remote from the Mississippi river, I was pleased to notice that one of the trustees was chosen from the West, and wishing to know that any money remitted to them would be used for the purposes set forth in the call, I wrote to a party in Dubuque enquiring as to the character and capacity of D. R. Burt of Dunleith, Ill., who was one of the five trustees named to control the funds. The reply was that "D. R. Burt had by industry and perseverance established a large business, that he had conducted it successfully, that as a man of integrity and probity, none stood higher, so much so that he was known by the name of 'honest Burt,' and that his word was as good as his bond." Since then, I have learned, that he has been repeatedly sent to the legislature of his State, and would have been elected Governor of the State of Wisconsin, had he not sacrificed his ambition on the altar of friendship, and through that sacrifice the first solid support was given to the Paine memorial fund. That friend offering him two thousand dollars for his services, this scrupulous, single hearted, noble old man refused to accept it, but presented it, half to the Memorial Hall, and half to the Lecture Fund. On receiving this letter, I sent forward a sum of money, and promised an additional sum when they were ready to expend it in building. I was at the laying of the foundation of the Hall on July 4th, 1874. I addressed the audience there assembled, encouraging all to help forward its completion.

On the following day I paid to J. P. Mendum the sum promised, and enquired into the nature of the Society, its constitution and plans for developing its resources and extending its influence, so that similar societies might spring up in every State of the Union. He told me that Mr. Altman had obstructed their movements, and had even threatened to issue an injunction to stop their proceedings, as illegal. "But," said he, "by the holy smoke he shall not do it."

I was amused at his original mode of swearing. Queen Elizabeth swore "by God's death." Others have sworn by Jesus and all the saints, but Mr. Mendum chose the most unsubstantial thing to swear by that I had ever heard. I then learned for the first time that there was any difference existing among the Trustees, and I expressed my sincere regret, and hoped the object would not fail on that account. He assured me it would not, that himself and the other two Trustees held the title, and the donors were safe. I ventured some close questions as to the actual state of things. When he lost temper and began to speak about his honesty and long services in the cause, and that nobody doubted their intentions to do what was right, I assured him that I had no reason to doubt his integrity and honesty of purpose, nor the other two Trustees, Mr. Seaver and Mr. Savage, nor Mr. Altman and Mr. Burt, who, it now appeared, were not Trustees, for before July 4th I had never met any of them. But they had declared, through the Investigator, that five trustees were to receive donations for the erection of a building, and I had merely desired to know how the matter stood.

On the following day, I met Mr. Underwood, and while seated under a tree in Boston Common, the question of the Paine Hall came up. I asked him what he knew about the Society, telling him that I had asked Mr. Mendum about the relations which the Trustees bore to Mr. Lick and others who had sent money to erect a building and create a "Lecture Fund." He frankly admitted that he did not know how matters stood, but thought there was no legal organization; that Mr. Mendum usually resented any attempt to inquire into the matter; that his high regard for Mr. Seaver had prevented him from pushing the enquiry, fearing that it might be regarded as an intrusion on his part, or might be construed by them as a doubt of their intentions to faithfully perform their trust; and further, that he regarded it as of the utmost importance that he, as the advocate, and they, as the publishers of Freethought, should be on good terms. I admitted the truth of this, and liked the fair and impartial way in which he spoke of the Trustees, and especially of Horace Seaver, in whom he placed the most undoubted confidence. Mr. Underwood promised me to call and ascertain whether the Trustees (for so I still regarded them), had taken care to have the property so placed that it would pass safely to their successors in office. I desired him to do this because I thought his personal acquaintance and public position as a lecturer would make it less offensive to them than to have similar inquiries put by me, a comparative stranger.

On July 29th, 1874, Mr. Underwood wrote me that after we separated, he had an interview with Mr. Mendum regarding the Paine Hall, that he talked very fairly, and that he would see me in N. Y. soon, and would talk with me again on the subject. When I met Mr. Underwood in New York, it appeared that nothing definite had been arrived at in his interview with Mr. Mendum and Seaver; that he had seen no articles nor deeds, in fact, that they had given him no definite information. Thinking that the best way to get the facts was to write to the Trustees (so-called) and get the information desired from them, on August 6th, 1874, I wrote as follows:

MESSRS. J. P. MENDUM AND HORACE SEAVER.

My Dear Friends: I address you as such, because we are engaged in a common cause, and that cause being unpopular, it is the more necessary that its few supporters should be firmly bound together by every tie that should unite honest men in seeking their own best interest and that of their race. I regret that any difference of opinion, real or imaginary, should have even temporarily divided the Trustees to whom is entrusted the funds of the Paine Memorial Hall. The generous gift of James Lick and many other donors to be set apart as a sacred legacy for the advocacy of POSITIVE TRUTH and intellectual freedom. If Mr. Altman and Mr. Burt are laboring under any misapprehension as to your course in the use of the Memorial Fund, I would suggest that you hasten at once to make the matter clear to the many who feel a deep interest in the success of the enterprise.

On page six of the Investigator, where you appeal to the friends of Thomas Paine to help the cause, it reads: "This Hall is intended for free meetings, and when the building is paid for, its rents and incomes will be bedevoted to supporting Liberal lectures, &c." Now then, publish in the Investigator the deed of trust for the purposes intended, which will show that there is really an instrument legally executed to you and your successors in office. Whether this would satisfy Mr. Altman and Mr. Burt, I cannot tell. But it will satisfy the many donors who have invested their funds in this noble enterprise, that the money is used for the purposes for which it was given, and not for the promotion of any personal ends. Hoping that you will see the propriety of this course and act accordingly, is the wish of your sincere friend,
G. L. HENDERSON.

In answer, I received the following reply:

Boston, August 8th, 1874.

FRIEND HENDERSON: Your kind letter is just received, and I beg to say that we are getting on finely with the Hall. I never understood that Mr. Burt was in the least dissatisfied with what we are doing in the matter and I think that friend Altman's technical objections are made for the purpose of making us keep our eyes open and not get over-reached by sharpers, as he supposed we might be. Everything so far as I know is satisfactory between us. The work is satisfactorily progressing and every one has confidence in our integrity if not in our wisdom, unless some insinuations from our enemies may have a vein of suspicion as to our intention. We have no apprehension of difficulty with Mr. Burt nor Mr. Altman, all our acts are open to them, and surely they can at any time investigate and soon find out if we are wrong in anything we do, and by their advice they can soon set us right. Truly yours,

J. P. MENDUM.

The careful reader will notice that my letter called for a publication of the deed. The reply took no notice of that call. I was the more astonished at this letter, because Mr. Mendum told me in Boston, that Mr. Altman was so much dissatisfied that he threatened to sue out an injunction to stop their work on the Paine Hall, and yet he writes that he had "no apprehension of difficulty with Mr. Burt and Mr. Altman." I made no enquiry about the progress of the work, mine was an enquiry into its safety to posterity, and that the Deed of Trust should be published in the Investigator, so that all the world might know what our Trustees were doing with the money remitted to them.

I confess I was not satisfied. Not one single line has ever appeared in the Investigator to intimate that any one had ever enquired into the doings of the Trustees. Trustees are expected to publish a balance sheet, showing how much had been expended of the money entrusted to them. Why are we compelled to write through THE TRUTH SEEKER instead of the old Investigator, who has for its motto, "hear all sides, then decide." But if they are not Trustees, they are not under any obligation to render an account of the money.

On August 28th, 1874, I called at their office in Boston, and happened to find the three Trustees together. I desired to know exactly how the property was held. Mr. Mendum replied that the deed was made to the three Trustees. "Are you named in the deed as Trustees?" Mr. Mendum replied "yes, for one of us cannot sell the property without the consent of the others." "Will you let me look at the deed?" Mr. Mendum expressed his willingness, but could not find the instrument; thought it was at his residence. I then stated, that since they would neither publish the deed in the Investigator, nor had the original at hand, I would go to the City Hall and read it in the record. Mr. Mendum then stated the fact that they held the deed as joint tenants, and not as Trustees. He became quite waspish—I know of no milder term to express his manner to me. One correspondent, Mr. Butts, calls it "rough, harsh and uncompromising." I should have been glad if he had been less so, for instance with Messrs. Burt and Henderson." Mr. Mendum proposed to return my money if I was not satisfied. I answered, I had given my money to a cause, and not to private individuals, and if that cause could not be attained, I would receive back my money, but if it could be attained, I would not receive it back.

Here Mr. Mendum became angry, and declared that "the funds were sent to them, on account of their personal services to build a home for the Investigator, and the Investigator is my property, and I shall do what I please with it and its home."

This is the purport of his language, though not his exact words. I entered my protest on the spot and denounced it as an iniquity. Some will enquire why I did not then make a public exposure. My reply is, that I hoped they could be induced to reconsider their course in this matter. The following letter to D. R. Burt, will make this more clear:

NEW YORK, Dec. 8th, 1874.

D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill.,

Dear Friend and Brother: At the request of Morris Altman, I write you, requesting that you be in New York city on Jan. 22d, 1875, for the purpose of devising the best method of arranging the Paine Hall property. You are aware that the lot on which the building is erected, is now held in fee simple by Messrs. Mendum, Seaver and Savage, and not as trustees of any society. As it now stands, the death of these three men would leave the whole property to their heirs, and would be a misappropriation of all the donations made by donors to aid a definite cause, and not a gift made to private individuals. You and Mr. Altman, as the other Trustees, must devise a way to place this property as it should be, in the hands of trustees and their successors, for the purpose of furthering the cause of Freethought.

I have written to B. F. Underwood to be here at the same time, and aid us with his counsel. He is well aware of all the facts in the case. I think, and hope, that the three gentlemen named will, when a proper plan is devised, immediately create a corporation and give a deed to the Trustees of the corporation, to be used for all time for the purposes intended by the donors, leaving a part of the building as a free home for the Investigator, and the other rents to be used in maintaining lectures and in circulating scientific literature.

Your letter of Nov. 23d in the Investigator, would lead the casual reader to suppose that you were fully satisfied with the way in which the funds were disposed of. I have already entered my protest to the parties themselves in their own office. Hoping, however, that we will not have a repetition of the Methodist Book Concern, I remain, yours very truly,
G. L. HENDERSON.

The following circular will show the inducements held out to the public, to send in their funds to the Trustees:

CIRCULAR TO THE LIBERAL PUBLIC.

DEAR SIR: We propose to purchase or, erect in the City of Boston a building to be known as the "Paine Memorial Hall," as a testimonial to the great services of THOMAS PAINE in the struggle for American Independence, and for universal mental freedom. Said building to be suitable for stores, business offices, a hall for free discussion, amusements, lectures, and finally an office for the business purposes of the Boston Investigator. To accomplish this, we need the assistance and contributions of all the friends of Mr. Paine and of the Investigator, and believing you to be one of the number on whom we may rely, this circular is sent to you, hoping you will give it your aid and assistance, by contributing liberally yourself, and inducing others to do so. Subscriptions will be given monthly in the columns of the Investigator. We have labored under many disadvantages during our connection with the Investigator, in providing suitable accommodations for our business, and in securing a hall for our Paine celebration, and we appeal now to the Liberal public to come forward and help us to secure a permanent place for business, and for holding our meetings.

We send out these circulars to the Liberal public, trusting that each one will consider himself or herself a special missionary, to procure and forward to Josiah P. Mendum, our Treasurer, all possible contributions. We trust, also, that in forwarding pledges of money to be paid when called for, the subscriber will rest assured that in developing a plan for the success of this enterprise, the highest practical business talent of Boston shall be employed in devising a legal method by which our rights, the rights of the subscribers, will be perpetually guaranteed.

Friends, brothers, sisters, the hour will come when we must cease from our labor. The cause that the proprietor and Editor of the Boston Investigator have expended their lives in, is in itself an earnest voucher, that not for self alone, but for humanity, they have worn away a lifetime. And we invite all our friends to zealous and prompt action, as advancing age indicates that time waits for none. We all feel solicitous that our works may still live after we retire; and that our advocate of freedom, our sturdy old Investigator, may still, for coming generations, sound our rallying cry, "For all peoples, and over all lands forever, Liberty."

J. P. MENDUM,
HORACE SEEVER,
J. M. BECKETT, } Trustees.
T. L. SAVAGE,
M. ALTMAN,

March 1st, 1871.

The death of Mr. Beckett led to the appointment of D. R. Burt, of Dunleith, Ill., after which I sent my contribution, as before stated.

I will now go back somewhat, and give a few letters that were written bearing upon the subject.

MENDUM TO ALTMAN.

Boston, Sept. 13, 1873.

Dear Friend Altman: Yours is received, and like all your letters is read attentively and with much interest. I think you are unnecessarily anxious about our responsibility. We deed only what has been granted to us as Trustees. We have been made bona fide Trustees by Mr. Lick, to sell or dispose or keep that property. Perhaps we have sold it, and so far as the other matter of organizing, it can be done any time when you feel disposed to come here and see us; especially after friend Burt gets back. I look on all this matter about as you do—the donations which have been sent to me were sent from friends of the Investigator to help give it a permanent, abiding place of business, etc. I choose to give it the title of Paine Memorial Hall, and Home for the Investigator—have contributed to it largely—and I hope to live to see the thing matured and carried out, and with your services and assistance I believe I shall. I believe that all has been contributed was for the benefit of the old Investigator, to keep it from being ousted and lost, or turned over to religious conductors after Seaver and I go away. Contributions have all come from its friends, and its friends will see it through—with your advice and assistance it will be done. After the return of Mr. Burt we must make arrangements to carry out some plan of organization. Yours truly,

J. P. MENDUM.

Boston, May 13, 1874.

Friend Altman: As you are aware we have agreed to take the three lots on Appleton Street, near the Parker Memorial Hall, which you saw when here. $5,000 is to be paid on receiving the deed; the balance, $20,000, to remain on mortgage one year. And as the mortgage and note must be signed by the Trustees, to whom the deed runs, and their wives, I forward to you the mortgage and note for you to sign, and for you to send to Mr. Burt for his and Mrs. Burt's signatures, and he to return to us for our signatures. Let the witnesses of the signatures state where witness, he or she, is. We have engaged the City Solicitor to examine the title, so that we may be sure everything is correct. Please forward with as little delay as possible. Respectfully yours,

J. P. MENDUM.

Copy of Mr. Altman's letter to Mendum, Seaver and Savage. Protest.

207 East 45th St., May 21, 1874.

FRIENDS MENDUM, SEEVER AND SAVAGE:

I send you the enclosed papers without my signature, first because the deed and mortgage should be made out in the name of the Trustees, and secondly that even that form is unnecessary unless you prefer it in that way.

The resolution unanimously passed by the Board of Trustees giving you power to purchase the property and erect the building, places the matter in the hands of you three gentlemen as a sub-committee, and the deed can be made out in the name of you three gentlemen as such committee, and the mortgage signed by you again as such—not requiring the signature of either Burt or myself; I, as for myself, and proxy for Burt, by voting in favor of empowering you with title, had, and still have, the fullest confidence in you, hence you need have no delicacy in having the deed and mortgage drawn up in your name as committee of such board of Trustees. I remain your co-trustee, (Signed) M. ALTMAN.

On January 20th, 1875, D. R. Burt arrived in New York, and upon consultation it was decided that Mr. Burt proceed to Boston and ascertain if they were willing to comply with the printed circular of March 1st, 1871, and devise a "legal method by which the rights of the subscribers could be perpetually guaranteed." If not, I declined to take any part in the dedication. Let me state at this stage that I pointed out two errors committed by Mr. Burt and Mr. Altman. 1st. Mr. Burt should have placed the money realized from the Lick property in the bank, subject to the order of J. P. Mendum, countersigned by the secretary, M. Altman. This would have been a check on the money. 2d. Morris Altman should have sent for D. R. Burt and gone to Boston, effected an organization, of which J. P. Mendum in his letter of Sept. 13th says: "it can be done at any time when you," (Altman and Burt,) "choose to come and see us, especially after friend Burt gets back," and had they done so perhaps at that time they would have kept their promise and have taken "legal measures to protect the subscribers." But D. R. Burt had then no suspicion that these men would refuse to comply, and Altman did protest and told them to make the deed in their names as a sub-committee and in trust. But they had the money in their own hands and used it in the erection of a building to themselves as joint tenants, of which the last survivor and his heirs will be the sole possessor; and this under the "advice of the highest practical talent of Boston, employed to protect the rights of the subscribers." The chances of life point to T. L. Savage as the man most likely to be the last survivor, and his children the heirs of the Lick donation and all other donations which become part of the realty of their joint-tenant lot.

Mr. Burt went forward to Boston and wrote back a very encouraging letter, that after the dedication they would organize and make all right. He urged me to come on and assist him, and bring as many from New York as I could induce to come. I went and met Messrs. Mendum and Savage, the latter assured me that everything would be made satisfactory after the dedication and wished us not to disturb the meeting by indicating that there was any difficulty among the Trustees. I was perfectly satisfied with this assurance, and my address on that occasion was an index of my happiness at the prospect that Freethinkers had at last begun to assert themselves in the erection of halls dedicated to science, and that the Paine Hall was the first fruits of the "Age of Reason."

On the following day we met together, when, to our astonishment, and sorrow, they absolutely refused to even discuss a plan of organization. Mr. Seaver said, "I think all are willing to trust us, and there is no need of making any change." Mr. Burt plead with them, saying, "I was chosen by you, I was made a Trustee by James Lick, I received the funds as a Trustee, and I would basely betray that trust were I to see it pass into the hands of private persons instead of Trustees." Mr. Savage arose and coolly left the room. Mr. Burt's anger knew no bounds. "Gentlemen," said he, "you have betrayed not only me, but have basely betrayed every man who contributed one dollar to this cause. Did you not promise me that after the dedication you would proceed to organize, and deed the property to legally qualified Trustees? I do not ask to be one of that board, but I do insist that such a board shall be created. Gentlemen you have treated me like an old horse who was once serviceable and useful but when he can be ridden no longer you turn him out to die." The old man became faint, and Mendum, Seaver and myself had to use restoratives and friction to prevent a stroke of apoplexy. It was a sad spectacle indeed, and I think that Mr. Seaver and even Mr. Mendum felt some compunctions as they saw the fearful mental suffering of this old hero, the veins on his forehead were full and ready to burst, and the heart-agony which he felt none can know. His faith in man was shaken, his fondest hopes blasted. Mr. Seaver spoke tenderly to him. "Friend Burt," said he, "I am willing to do right, we will all meet again to-morrow night, and this thing shall be set right so that you will be perfectly satisfied." With this assurance we parted. The old man remained moody and silent, his lips moved incessantly as if in communication with some one. He neither ate nor slept that night.

Among my papers I find the following penciled lines to D. R. Burt, dated Jan. 31st, 1875:

MY DEAR FRIEND: I fully understand the distress you experience at being ignored by your co-Trustees after what you have so generously done for the Paine Hall fund and the cause of mental freedom. But you must control your feelings and move with caution, and if possible save these men from themselves and from degrading our cause by proving themselves incapable of receiving a trust for the benefit of society, and instead, blindly appropriating it to their own personal use. You will please read Mr. Altman's letter of June 20th, 1874.

TO J. P. MENDUM, Secy: As member of, and Secretary to, the B. P. H. M. F. I would respectfully ask: First. In whose name, and how is the deed executed and recorded. Second. Has any money other than the $5,000 which I signed, been drawn from the funds as per the resolution of the May meeting? Third. Please send me a copy of the contract entered into for the building of the Paine Hall.

Yours Truly, M. ALTMAN.

To which Mendum replies;

June 30th, 1874.
M. ALTMAN, Esq. We regret very seriously that you can't be here on the 4th, and give us an opportunity to assure you that we are doing nothing but what is right and just. That your fears of our dishonesty are altogether groundless. We are obliged to hurry up to have our Hall ready to lease as soon as our TENANT requires it, and are short of time; but as we intend to do right, it is rather cutting for any friend to presume we intend wrong, and threaten an injunction on us. If he knows aught against us he should make the charge direct.

But I would beg to say one word about that deed. First. It was made out to us five Trustees, but you did not see fit to sign the mortgage. That required a new deed which is made to us three, as joint tenants. As Trustees, we could not give a mortgage without a permit from the Supreme Court. We had no time, and did the best we could do after you returned the mortgage.

With much respect, yours, &c., J. P. MENDUM.

Carefully compare the two letters of September 13, 1873, where the "organizing is to be done after Mr. Burt gets back," and that of June 30, 1874, where he admits that the deed should be to them as Trustees and not as joint tenants, and for not doing, which he pleads the want of time to get an order from Court to give the mortgage! Now you are here and ask them to organize, they refuse!

For seven days we tried to get them to effect this. We presented a plan of organization with the following names as Trustees: Susan H. Wixon, Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, T. L. Savage, Louis Masquerier, E. P. Stowe, M. Lamb, D. R. Burt, M. Altman, Nathaniel Myrick. Mr. Burt and Mr. Altman offered to withdraw, if that was necessary to effect an organization, but every overture was rejected, and at last, in order to close the matter, the following paper was presented for their signatures:

MESSRS. BURT AND HENDERSON.

Gentlemen: Regarding the matter in controversy, we would say that we regard the various contributions to the "Paine Memorial Hall and Home of the Investigator," as personal gifts to us on account of our long services in the cause of infidelity, and decline to make any other disposal of the property than that which now exists.

Messrs. Mendum and Seaver both read this carefully and approved of it. Mendum sat down, and partly wrote his name under it, when it occurred to him to enquire what we intended to do with the paper when they had both signed. Our reply was that for eight days we had remained in Boston, at our own expense, trying to do what should have been done before a single dollar had been received by them and what James Lick supposed existed when he deeded them his mill property, and in his letters repeatedly speaks of them "as a society." When you sign that paper, we cease all attempts at an adjustment of this matter by mutual effort. We will trouble you no more personally. This will be your final decision, and this property is in reality the 'Home of the Investigator,' so far as you can make it.

"But," he enquired, "would you not recognize it as the home of the Investigator?"

I replied that one floor of it would be rent free and would be a great help to the Investigator.

He arose in a great rage and said: "G—d d—n it! it will cost me more, in the Paine Hall, than it does now in Washington street, by the holy smoke!"

An altercation then ensued between Messrs. Burt, Mendum and Seaver. The old man again plead with them by everything that was sacred in humanity and in justice, not to do so rash an act, as to strangle in its infancy, the first great effort on this continent to organize a society whose object would be to make this earth a heaven, by teaching man how to live in this world. "Gentleman, organize! and deed the property to the trustees, subject to all encumbrances. Announce to the world the principles you propose to propagate. Show, that if we tear down the false, we will also build up the true. And I warrant you that, in two years, every dollar of debt will be paid, and there will be money besides in the treasury, to employ lecturers and teachers. By Jove, I would give my life, for this cause!"

It was fortunate for them that he did not hear all that was said in reply, by these misguided men; otherwise this meeting might have ended in a tragedy. For so terribly was this man of giant frame and pure heart aroused, that I feared, at one time, that he would seize them, one in either hand, and dash them into Washington street, through their own three story window.

This was our last interview with them personally. What occurred later, must be left for a future paper and since they have refused to show in the Investigator what they have done with their trust, we hope they will now open its columns, and discuss all sides of this case.

Paine Hall—Protest.

CARYVILLE, MASS., Feb. 1st, 1875.

D. R. BURT,

My Esteemed and Venerable Friend: I understand that the "Paine Memorial Hall" is erected upon lots held by three men, as joint-tenants, in fee simple, and not in trust, as intended by James Lick and others, therefore I denounce it as an iniquity, and demand that the property be transferred to legally qualified trustees and their successors in office, constituting a corporate body in conformity with the laws of this State, relating to educational and charitable institutions. To such a society only did I make my contribution of $50. Yours for justice, EMORY P. STOWE.

A Legal Question—Is it Safe?

FRIEND BENNETT: Like yourself and others, I regret the necessity that forced this unhappy controversy before the public; but as every honorable effort to have the matter properly adjusted has failed, let us know the whole truth of the case, and to that end allow me to reply to only one point in Mr. Butts' defense of the Boston men, which is really the only one in which the public are interested, namely: Whether the tenure by which the Paine Hall is held, is such as will insure its perpetuation for all time, for the purpose for which its donors designed it, and for no others.

Mr. Butts asserts that the tenure of "joint tenancy," on which this property is held by three of the original Trustees, is such a tenure. Let us see if this be so.

The essential principles of the tenure of joint tenancy as expounded by Chancellor Kent, Vol. IV. page 357, are:

First. "A joint tenant in respect to his companion, is seized of the whole; but for the purposes of alienation, and to forfeit, and to lose by default in a praecipe, he is seized only of his undivided part or proportion."

Second. "If A and B be joint tenants, and A conveys his joint interest, being his moiety of the estate to C, the joint tenancy is severed, and turned into a tenancy in common, as between B and C, for they hold under different conveyances."

Third. "On the death of a joint tenant, his interest being undivisible by will, passes over to the remaining joint tenants, and on the death of the last joint tenant, it reverts to his heirs, or to the State, if he leaves none."

Such being the nature of joint tenancy, three contingencies are liable to happen to estates held by that tenure.

First. That unless expressly stated in the instrument, creating the joint tenancy, that it is a trust for a specified purpose, (which is not known to be the case) the donors have no security that their donations will continue to be used for the purposes for which they were designed, except the promises of the three joint tenants. Should the mere word of any three men, however honest, be deemed a sufficient guarantee in such a case?

Second. By a sale of his interest by any one of the three joint tenants, the purchaser becomes a tenant in common with the other two, and consequently may devise his interest to others, or his heirs may succeed to it, who, not being legally restrained from using the property for any other purpose, except that designed by the original grantors, may not have the disposition so to use it.

Third. But supposing the joint tenants to remain faithful to the cause, and to their promises during their lives, what is to prevent the heirs of the last surviving joint tenant, from diverting the property to other uses than those intended by James Lick, and other donors to the Paine Memorial Hall?

HUGH BYRON BROWN.

A Letter from Minnesota.

LEROY, Nov. 7th, 1875.

TO G. L. HENDERSON. Dear Brother: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER, lately, a rumpus about the Paine Hall matter. Who is this man, Butts, who defends Mendum & Co. so ardently. He acknowledges that the board of Trustees are not, and never were, a legal body, and yet claims that the present management of the Hall, is in the best possible shape to benefit posterity; and he intimates in his letters, that Burt and Altman are sowing discord amongst the Liberals of America, by trying to get the whole matter on a sound legal basis.

It looks bad to see this jangle amongst men who pride themselves on their advancement in everything that relates to reason and a sound morality. This Paine Hall matter is a very simple affair. It is not as Mr. Butts seems to intimate, dependent on the virtues or good intentions of Mendum, Seaver, George Washington, Jesus Christ or any other man. The question is, whether this Hall belongs to the Liberals of America or to Mendum and Seaver. If it is as Mr. Burt and Mr. Butts both intimate, that the Trustees never were a legal body, under the laws of Massachusetts; and if the parties in whom the property is now vested, refuse to transfer it to the Liberals of America through a legally constituted body of Trustees, then we have simply another instance of sharp practice where the Liberal element of this country have built an office for a paper, called the Investigator, under the supposition that they were building a hall commemorative of the great Statesman, Thomas Paine, and set apart for the promulgation of Freethought and Liberal ideas, of which he was the great exponent. I would suggest that the Liberals take a lesson from the Presbyterians, who, in addition to laying up treasures in heaven, never forget to look after the title deeds of their churches. Your affectionate brother,

WM. L. HENDERSON.

Letter From Asa K. Butts.

NEW YORK, Nov. 6th, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: I was more glad than sorry to see M. Altman's liberal display of his nether self in your last issue. Such exhibitions will give your readers a glimpse into the very seat and source of the Paine Hall difficulty, and in such a cause it matters not if I do get a little bespattered with his characteristic insinuations, frothy falsehoods, and blustering blackguardism. I only ask of your fairness a chance to wipe it off again.

First. I plead guilty to the heinous crime of having once been a "Free Religionist," and I still am one as much as Altman is still a Jew, perhaps more so. That is, in the best sense of the term—if it has any sense—I am still a Free Religionist; but I feel no more out of place among you "uncircumcised Infidels," so called, than if I had been longer in your ranks. To have been once a Jew or a Free Religionist, is no reproach to a man. What is the man now? That is the question. The principal difference between the claim of Altman and his "busybody meddling," to a home among Infidels, is, that while one has made money advertising his fancy goods in your papers, the other has lost it in publishing books and pamphlets for you.

I am willing to refer to Altman's own referees on this point. Even on Paine Hall matters I have performed more in proportion to my promises than he, as will appear.

It is for the honor of the Liberals of this city that the undersigned "rushes into print to defend better men than himself" against vile insinuations, which, whoever may believe them now, had but one source and fountain head, and that is becoming more and more visible as the mist rises. Messrs. A. B. & C., have dragged their dirty linen right under my nose, and I ask permission—but not of them—to stand by and see it washed.

Messrs. Mendum and Seaver will doubtless be thankful for Altman's certificate of their character as "honest, upright men," "strictly honest and conscientious," "better men" than I am. They would hasten to return the compliment, doubtless, only that Altman instructs us that "no man deserves special credit for being honest," and they will not put that barren crown upon his head to-day, I guess.

There is no offense in their being "better men" than I. They certainly ought to be, as they are so much older. I cannot hope to be any better than they, even when I have lived to be a Freethinker as long. They are the standard bearers. Altman and I are in the ranks, and we might be ten times worse than we are, and it would matter little. But Altman's present opinion of these men shows a most miraculous conversion since, in private he denounced them by every epithet, contrary to what he now says, and in your columns, said they had "violated" their most solemn obligations, and insinuated his "honest, (I hope)" into bewildered eyes. How soon will Messrs. B. and C., and the rest of the alphabet also repent and announce their faith in Boston? Stand up and be prayed for, gentlemen, I am wrestling in prayer for you even now, "and while the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner" may take up his cross and follow M. Altman back into Paine Hall, even more rapidly than you followed him out.

Now about the Index. Let those who know us both put Altman's story side by side with mine, and see which they believe.

He says I called on him "several times," etc. He "refused several times." Now if one time is "several" he is right about my calling, but not as to his refusing. He did not refuse at all. He merely put me off, as he said, until I should conclude to give him space in the Index as low as he had bought it in the Investigator. He wanted some editorial endorsement, too, which I could not promise him. Thereby, as he said, he had made several thousands a year out of his advertisements in the Investigator, and when he was convinced he could do as well in the Index, rates as low, etc., he would try it. I measured my man too well in the first interview to expect him to take stock.

The next time I went to him, I sprung upon him the proposition, which he says, that he made me; viz: that I should pay ten dollars a year toward Paine Hall, and he ten dollars toward the Index fund, i. e. take a share in the stock. I remember thinking over, as I approached him, that I should have to flatter him to get that out of him; so I began the conversation to this effect: "Mr. Altman, we want the influence of your name on our stock list for the Index, and so I propose," etc. I had made the acquaintance of Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, and determined on putting a few more bricks in their hands for Paine Hall anyhow, so that Altman's subscription cost me nothing.

I never saw Mr. Altman again until last Summer ('74). Hearing he had quarreled with the Index as well the Investigator, I went to hear him deliver himself. He said, among other things, that he had written Abbot that "Asa K. Butts was fully justified," that is, in my course with the Index matters. This he remarked to others also, in this city. Compare this with his insinuation about my connection with The Index funds. You see what reliance to place on his statements, or rather call them insinuations, about Paine Hall.

The Index is running yet on the funds I raised for it. It would have died the second year but for my exertions, as I can prove by Abbot's letters, and whoever says or insinuates that I am indebted to them to the amount of one cent, either lies, or is miserably befooled. They tried to withdraw the suit they merely for effect put upon me, but as my lawyer and I both objected to its withdrawal, it hangs there, and has never been brought to trial. Altman can purchase the claim, and if the court awards him anything, he shall have it to the last cent.

Six or eight months after Altman subscribed to the Index stock, he says I was turned out of the Index. I had, as he says, subscribed $100 toward Paine Hall, but I was to pay it in ten annual installments, and to the Paine Hall Fund, not to the Index. (This arrangement I have kept to this day, having sent my fourth recently.) So when he wrote me some four or five months before it became due, asking what I meant to do about it, I replied to the effect that I should pay to the Paine Hall Fund as, and at the time, agreed upon. He, to my utter astonishment, wrote me that "then he should be compelled to tell the Index Association the whole arrangement." I think my reply to that was almost precisely in the following words:

"Friend Altman: Are you a trifle sun-struck this Summer, or what ails you? If you wish to tell Abbot our arrangement, why in heaven's name don't you do so? It will be no news to him. Tell the whole Association, and proclaim it to the rest of mankind from the house-top, if you like, there is nothing to be ashamed of."

His confused, suspicious nature thus revealed itself to me, and I shall never be surprised at any statement he makes again, whether about myself or Paine Hall. This was the first time his gun went off at half-cock to my knowledge, and "he failed to hit me," for there was not the shadow of evidence, save in his now suspicious heart, that I intended to back out of my pledge to Paine Hall. There was no other personal unpleasantness between us than as above. I was indignant at being suspected of being like him, a repudiator, and I am indignant that "better men" should also be suspected, and that he should have inculcated "better men" on his own side with suspicions worthy only of him.

He accuses me of the "violation of his (my) contract," and I am ready to show any friend or decent enemy, even, by the acknowledgment in the Investigator and Mr. Mendum's receipts, that I have fulfilled my contract to the letter. Now when he accuses the Boston men of "violation," etc., we know what it amounts to. He asks what I "know of Paine Hall matters, any way?" If I am allowed a fair hearing in this paper, he may find out that I know quite as much as he does about it. Having asked, like a man, for facts and figures, I have had access to the whole story, and seen some letters, for instance, of Mr. Burt's, concerning this thing and Altman's share in it, which may, if I ever publish them, surprise Altman and amuse as well as instruct your readers. But as Altman knows so much, perhaps he will tell us what has become of the $13,000 which Mr. Burt says is lost to the cause or the fund here in New York.

Having replied to his personalities, this once I promise not to intrude personal matters again. My character has not much bearing in Paine Hall matters, I admit. His has, however, too much bearing, as already appears. In this matter, as in the Index affairs, I act only on the defensive, and for the defendant. When I find myself in the minority and no case, except to whine about my treatment in the public press, I will be quiet. If attacked, however, I have defended myself, and incidentally "better men" also, and will do it again. Nearly all of Mr. Burt's points were covered by my article in the same issue, except about taxes. We Liberals are trying to have the churches taxed, meanwhile let us pay the taxes on our own Church like men, and say nothing about sneaking out of it under the shadow of the church steeple.

Mr. Burt has no idea how absurd it is to talk seriously about "advancing the personal aggrandizement of any one or any three men." Please tell us, Mr. Burt, where this "aggrandizement" comes in. Neither you nor I, nor seven, nine, eleven or thirteen like us would like to take this "aggrandizement" off their hands. Excuse me at any rate. Do you seriously exhort Mr. Underwood and myself to approach these "Boston parties" "with firmness and kindness" "advising" them to get down on their knees and "make a clean breast of it."

Picture it, my dear sir, and think how Underwood and myself would look in the role of father confessors to Seaver and Mendum, or making a "searching investigation" under those gray hairs and into those depleted pockets to see if a cent or two has got out of place. What could we say except, "sinful children you are accused of taking your own way instead of M. Altman's way, and you regard not the voice of Burt and Coduan, confess, therefore, how much you have made—out of pocket—by Paine Hall. Tell us wherefore ye refuse longer to sleep in the same bed with Altman (I hope they will do this) and your sins shall have absolution." I can think of two ways, only, more reasonable than this. The first is for Messrs. Altman and Burt to cease flinging their grievances in the faces of those who don't wish to see them, and tell their lawyer to fight it out in the courts. The second manly way is for Mr. Burt to bring on the $135,361.51 which he speaks of, and his own board of trustees with it, and offer to take Paine Hall with all its obligations. In this case I have been authorized by Messrs. Seaver and Savage verbally, and Mr. Mendum by letter, to say that they would instantly and gladly accept, provided always they were not required to sit on that board themselves. And if Mr. Burt will do this he shall have an account of every cent expended, and it shall be turned in to swell the amount to $175,000, or thereabouts, to be exact.

Messrs. A. B. and C. do you mean business, or do you mean revenge and scandal and the evasion by me of you at least, of his promised contributions to this cause? Will you not now "either put up, or shut up" and "give us a rest"? Mr. Editor, you say I am recognized as the "authorized spokesman for the Boston parties." Let me not be misapprehended. I am authorized to make the above offer to all whom it may concern; and I have some of my facts and figures from Boston parties; but they have never asked me to act as their attorney in this case, nor are they in any way responsible for my manner of treating it, personalities, etc. It is true I am and have been, to a slight extent, a customer of Mr. Mendum's like Mr. Altman, but I can't say that I ever made anything by it. I have never touched Liberalism, except either directly or indirectly, to lose money, and I never expect to gain by it pecuniarily. But I do not live merely to make money, if I did I might be marching along behind Mr. Altman with two or three who are "better men." Very truly yours,

ASA K. BUTTS.

The Light of the Gospel.

Of all the Presbyterian clergy, whether of the Old or New school, none stood higher than the late Albert Barnes, the well-known author of "Notes on the Gospels." Mr. Barnes knew the "Word of God" by heart from Genesis to Revelations, and supposed he had mastered the exact meaning of every syllable and sentence it contained to the splitting of a colon. There was not a dark saying in the "sacred volume" that he could not make as clear to the faithful of his church as mud is in sunlight. For half a century Dr. Barnes preached the Orthodox Gospel in one of the most fashionable and well-attended churches in Philadelphia, and devoted his leisure moments to the study of the "Holy Scriptures," until he became "perfect" in its understanding, and "thoroughly furnished unto all good Orthodox works." And now, after more than half a century's close study of the Bible and preaching of the gospel, listen to what the good man has to say. In one of his last letters on biblical subjects, he thus bemoans the lack of light afforded by the book which Pollok terms "the bright candle of the Lord." (See page 124, of Practical Sermons): "I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world, why the earth is strewn with the dying and the dead, and why man must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown upon these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind; nor have I an explanation to offer or a thought to suggest that would be a relief to you. I trust other men, as they profess to do, understand this better than I do, and that they have not the anguish of spirit that I have; but I confess, when I look on a world of sinners and sufferers, upon death-beds and graveyards, upon the world of woe, filled with hearts to suffer forever; when I see my friends, my parents, my family, my people, my fellow citizens; when I look upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger; when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned; and when I feel that God only can save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb. It is all dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it." Thus, this greatest and purest of modern Orthodox divines not only acknowledges the entire failure of Christianity, but practically throws overboard the whole system as a thing of naught. "Not one ray of light," not even the eating of the apple by Eve, dis-closes to him "why sin came into the world." Nor does God, although "he only can," do anything to save sinners, and "all is darkness to his soul." What an awful comment is this upon the Gospel, the preaching and diffusion of which, it is claimed, is to enlighten the world!

The especial merit of the Gospel, Christians claim, is the light and consolation it affords the true believers in the hour of death. Infidels are represented as taking a leap in the "dark." But the glorious gospel left it all "dark, dark" to the soul of Barnes. "In all my experience," says the Rev. Theodore Clapp, of New Orleans, "I never saw an unbeliever die in fear." It is probable that I have seen a greater number of those so-called irreligious persons breathe their last than any other clergyman in the United States. But when I first entered the clerical profession, I was struck with the utter inefficiency of most forms of Christianity to afford consolation in a dying hour. Jesus, the object of the Christian's faith, could neither deliver himself from death, nor from the terror that it inspired. Hear his prayer, in prospect of approaching death: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." It was not possible; and in the anguish of his soul he exclaims: "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" So overcome by terror at the prospect of his own death as to "sweat, as it were, great drops of blood," it is not surprising that the believers in him tremble at the grim skeleton. Unable to deliver himself, how can he be expected to deliver his followers?

Friendly Correspondence.

WM. T. WELLBORN, Forest City, Ark., writes: I am nearly a Spiritualist after reading your reply to Willicott in the Investigator.

W. F. JAMIESON, Eddyville, Iowa, writes: Put me down as a subscriber for your book, "The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers." It appears to me such a volume will prove invaluable.

A. W. BEMIS, Montezuma, Ill., writes: Put my name down for a copy of "The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers." THE TRUTH SEEKER is a cheap journal. Keep the mill going. Let light into the dark recesses of superstition.

J. W. SCOTT, Morrill, Kan., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and will be glad when it comes out in its new dress every week. Consider me a subscriber as long as it continues on its present tack.

WM. E. POLHEMUS, Charlotte, Mich., writes: I see by the Banner of Light a notice of your coming book. I cannot do without it. O for a stirring up of the dry bones of old theology and the advancement of truth.

C. L. HEATH, Angola, Ind., writes: Your paper is the best eye-opener I ever read. Go ahead in the good work of pulling down the strongholds of ignorance. You will be sustained. Your letter to Immanuel J. is a stunner to Christians.

R. J. LAMBORN, Glen Hall, Pa., writes: I take five papers besides THE TRUTH SEEKER. I spend more time reading the latter than in reading all the others, and it is unpleasant to read that you are short of funds, and that the subscribers are slow to pay up.

W. R. YOUNG, Mankato, Minn., writes: I have received the first number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will say that I am truly delighted with it. Keep on, regardless of Mrs. Grundy. People are becoming wiser and better, and are entertaining more liberal views.

J. F. GREEN, Hyde Park, Pa., writes: You can count on me for a copy of your new book, "The World's Sages," etc. I have been thinking for the past twenty years that Christianity was a gigantic humbug, and my every-day observation only confirms that opinion.

A. HAKES, Clay, N. Y., writes: I have resolved a number of times, that under the circumstances in which I am placed, I had better give up THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I find that I cannot relinquish it—that I must have it, for it is the best paper that I have ever read.

ABEL GOODNOE, Zoar, Mass., writes: I like your paper better than any other of its class in this great country. You are doing a mighty work in fighting the superstitions of the day, and you have my best wishes in the cause of Freethought, liberty and progress.

HORATIO GATES, Breakabeen, N. Y., writes: For the sake of humanity keep the machine running until this disgusting superstition that makes men and women run after and bow down to priests, and submit themselves to their will and wish, thinking they are doing God service by so doing, is destroyed, root and branch.

Blow ye the trumpet.

Let all the nations know;

To earth's remotest bound,

The time for Liberal thought is come;

Come home to common sense.

Come home!

Ye who in ignorance wrought.

And placed a priest above,

May have the truth unbought,

The gift of friendly love.

The day of Liberal thought is come;

Come home to common sense.

Come home!

Ye who have sold for nought,

Your happiness below,

Return to sober thought.

And you may surely know

The day of science now is come;

Come home to common sense.

Come home!

Ye slaves to priest-forged hell.

Your liberty receive;

Be just, and truly tell.

As long as you can live.

The day of jubilee is come.

Come home to common sense.

Come home!

L. O. ROOT, Minneapolis, Minn., writes: I regard THE TRUTH SEEKER as the best reading I ever had. Each one comes loaded with life-stirring truths. You have truly worked yourself up to an enviable position, and may the time soon come when THE TRUTH SEEKER will be found in every house in this priest-ridden land.

J. COOK, Lake Village, N. H., writes: I hope that the time is not far distant when Freethinkers may be secured the right "to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" in this country. Your live TRUTH SEEKER is making priests tremble. The people are beginning to read and think for themselves, and truth must prevail.

W. P. KREMER, Wapello, Iowa, writes: I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is just such a paper as every Liberal should feel it his duty to support. It fills a vacuum long felt in the progressive world. The Investigator is good in some respects, but is known to be notoriously old-foggy on some issues, which lowers it in the estimation of many.

P. R. WRIGHT, San Bernardino, Cal., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is gaining ground. I hear it universally applauded by all Liberals and Spiritualists. Keep good cheer and go ahead! Better times are coming. Don't fear about being too radical. A Western divine remarked: "It used to be the issue of the day, Is the Bible true? but the issue of the day is now, Is there a God?"

DR. N. H. DILLINGHAM, Boston, Mass., writes: I go for all reform so far as I can carry out in conformity with my creed, which has but two articles, viz:

Never condemn anybody or theory without positive proof.

To live no longer in the bodily tenement than I can pay the rent.

BENJAMIN F. STAMM, Detroit, Mich., writes: Send me a copy of "The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers" as soon as published. Although my library is sufficiently large, and my advance in years precludes my reading much beyond the papers of the day, yet I feel that I must wade through one more volume, and add it to the many on hand. I am sanguine as to the use of such works as we advance in education and civilization.

W. P. ROSECRANS, Clear Lake, Iowa, writes: The correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER are among the grandest thinkers of the age, and their writings are doing much to remove the priestly thralldom that still holds mankind in darkness and degradation in spite of free schools and free presses. THE TRUTH SEEKER must and shall live to carry messages of truth and freedom until the last son and daughter of humanity have been redeemed.

S. STEVENS, Knoxville, Ill., writes: I appreciate your paper. It is doing a good work, and nothing gives me more pleasure than to read your paper. It is more than fifty years since the total fallacy and nonsense of the Christian mythology became as apparent to me as my own existence. Yet I know that if a man die, he shall live again. I have seen and held communion with several of my friends and relatives since they were in spirit life, just as plainly and palpably as when they were in the flesh.

ORRIS BARNES, Clay, N. Y., writes: Every truth-loving Freethinker in America ought to become a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you had lived in the days of the Puritans, and published such a paper, they would have served you as they did the honest Quakers, or drive you out as they did Roger Williams. Let us bless our stars that we live in these days of Liberal thought, when men can express their views without fear of the Inquisition. Your "Open Letter" (whoever the writer may be), is one of the shrewdest things I ever read. It ought to be issued in tract form. "The world moves."

S. W. LIPSCOMB, Greenfield, Ill., writes: Please count me a subscriber for your proposed work, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers." I am a poor young man just starting out in the world, and for some time have been consulting with myself whether I should be able to enjoy the treat of your book or not. I have finally come to the conclusion that I will have the book if I have to work Sundays to pay for it. I have been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years, and while it remains the strong advocate of free thought and free speech that it now is, I shall continue to be one. I hope the day is not far off when this priest-trodden country will be truly free, and the whole horde of pampered pastors and ministers will be obliged to earn their living by the sweat of their brow like honest men.

DR. H. H. JACKSON, Cleveland, O., writes: I have been a regular and earnest reader of your little God-send for blind humanity (THE TRUTH SEEKER) for two years. When I say, "God-send," don't think I mean any great personal being away yonder on a white throne. Not a bit of it. Such is not my God. My God is the great and wise power (if you please) which enables the wise and good to come near and guide your pen in the silent hours spent in your sanctum, which may be any of those noble philosophers mentioned in the first, second or third part of your great work in press, "The World's Sages, Infidels and Thinkers." Please place my name on your list for a copy. May the pure in thought be with you; may the wise and noble guide and strengthen you in your noble work.

JOHN CLARK, Washington, Ind., writes: I am well pleased with your paper. I do not know how I could do without it. Every Liberal should feel it his duty to support it. It is my heartfelt wish that it may live long and that it may dispel the mists of superstition. I trust Liberals and Seekers after Truth will respond to your moderate terms. Poygism and superstition are losing ground in this section. The Jesus business is becoming more and more transparent every day. Free presses and free discussion are fast wiping out the landmarks of priestcraft. I trust the time is not far hence when every man and every church will teach the doctrine of that noble advocate of truth and reason, Thomas Paine, whose life-motto was: "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

EDWARD PALMER, North Castine, Me., writes: One of my neighbors, a sea captain, has for years been considered one of the best of men, and kindest to those in his employment. About a year ago he "got religion." The present season he flogged a boy who lived with him, so severely that he endangered his life. Another neighbor of mine "experienced religion" at the same reformation. This summer he so severely whipped an orphan boy (his nephew) that the lad was obliged to flee to one of the neighbors for safety. A while since the Rev. Henry F. Durant, the founder of the Wellesley Female College, and worth his millions, set fire to some brush so near a new house, which one of his neighbors had just completed, as to greatly endanger it. The owner of the house had warned him not to fire the brush. Durant, however, caused the fire to be set, and in a short time the house was a heap of ashes. The reverend millionaire persistently refuses to compensate his neighbor, (a poor man who does not belong to his church,) for his loss.

Christianity and the Bible
AGAINST
Philosophy and Science.

better post and fortify the Liberal mind as more bulky and ambitious work. Liberal friend, no fitter work can be selected to hand to your bigoted neighbor of the Church than this instructive pamphlet.

Anxious to spread the truth, we have reduced the price of this work, (which is elegantly printed in clear type, on fine white paper,) to twenty cents, postage 2 cents.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "EXETER HALL."

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH. "Rich in romantic and pathetic incident." It exhibits, with a terrible array of facts, the atrocities committed by the Christian Church at various times. It shows that "the purest morals existed without the Bible," and that many of the Heathen Philosophers were as great lovers of virtue as the characters named in the Bible. Shocking instances are given of the depravity of many Christian ministers, and of the prevailing inhumanity among Christian people. "The folly of Foreign Missions, while the heathen at home are neglected, is powerfully illustrated." "On the whole it is the work of a master hand." "A work of unaffected beauty," and its most valuable feature is, all positions are proved and authorities given.

Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

500 pp. 12mo. In paper $1, postpaid; cloth $1 50.

EXETER HALL.

"Beautiful, tender, delicate, and pathetic in its appeals." "A truthful portraiture of the mischievous tendencies of religion." It is a "denial of the authority and inspiration of the Bible." It portrays the "development of the practical effects of religious fanaticism as seen in the family and in society." "Altogether it is the most scorching book ever published in America since the 'Age of Reason.'"

Paper, 60c.; Cloth, 80c.

These two great works should be in the library of every searcher after truth and every lover of mental liberty. The two in paper will be sent for $1 50; in cloth for $2 20.

Odds and Ends.

"THAT clock, stranger," said a Michigan farmer, "was the best kind of a clock up to six months ago, when my daughter began to have beaux, and now the blamed thing is always two hours' slow."

"OH, my friends," exclaimed an orator, "that I had a window in my heart, that you might all look in and see the truth of what I tell you!" "Wouldn't a pain in your stomach do just as well?" asked a small boy.

WHILE a San Francisco undertaker was drawing his tapeline over the corpse of a Chinese woman, he was surprised to see her roll her eyes up at him. The surrounding friends showed no surprise, but simply said, "She be dedee by twelve o'clock."

MAMMA (to her oldest son)—"My dear George, where are your manners? You should always say 'Thank you' when anything is handed to you." George—"Oh, bother, having to say thanks every time, ma! Can't a fellow have a season ticket?"

A LITTLE German girl in a public school of this city was told to put the word year in a sentence. After a moment's reflection she answered: "Last year my sister was married; this year she has a baby."

JONES had prepared himself for a home dinner to his liking. He sat down in his dining room at peace with all the world, and said: "Now, Hannah, bring the cold mutton. No hot meat for me this weather." Hannah hesitated for a minute and said: "But I done give it away, sir." "Give it away! Give my dinner away?" "Yes, sir. You said if any tramps called, I was to give them the cold shoulder."

SNIFKINS staked his all on the result of a game of euchre the other night and lost. Throwing down the cards peevishly he broke forth in the following pathetic strain: "'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour; I've seen my fondest hopes take flight, and every time I played left bow-er, some one took it with the right."

"What's all this talk about the councency and the five-twinties and the sivin-thirties that I hear about Mike?" "Why, bliss your sowl, don't ye know, Pat? It manes that the government wants to make the laborin' min work from five-twinty in the mornin' till sivin-thirty in the evening." "Och, the spalpeens! May the devil choke them!"

A FAIR GAME, BUT NOT EQUAL.—During the war a Georgian started to Marietta with some chickens for sale. He met a squad of soldiers, and they bought all his chickens, but one rooster. He insisted they should take him, but they were out of money, and couldn't buy.

The old man said he hated to go on to town with only one chicken, and was greatly puzzled about it.

At last one of the soldiers said: "Old man, I'll play you a game of seven up for him."

"Agreed," says the old man.

They played along and spirited game. At last the soldier won. The old man wrung the rooster's neck and tossed him at the soldier's feet, and mounted his swab-tailed pony and started for home. After getting some two hundred yards he suddenly stopped, turned round, and rode back and said:

"You played a fair game, and won the rooster fairly; but I'd like to know what in the h—l you put up agin that rooster?"—Meridian Homestead.

UNJUST SUSPICIONS.—The other day a Detroit husband went on a fishing excursion with a small party of friends. Returning at midnight, he pounded on the door and awoke his wife. As she let him into the hall, she saw that something ailed him, and cried out:

"Why, Henry, your face is as red as paint."

"Guessers n't," he replied, feeling along he hall.

"And I believe you've been drinking," she added.

"Whizzer mean by that?" he inquired, trying to stand still.

"Oh! Henry, your face would never look like that if you had'n't been drinking."

"Mi to blame?" he asked, tears in his eyes. "S'poken big bass jumped up'n hit me in th' face an' make it red—mi to blame?"

And he sat down on the floor and cried over her unjust suspicions.—Detroit Free Press.

ABOUT ALLIGATORS—Another, who like Washington, could not lie.—The passenger, who was going down the big river for the first time in his life, secured permission to climb up beside the pilot, a grim old grayback who never told a lie in his life.

"Many alligators in this river?" inquired the stranger, after a look around.

"Not so many now, since they got to shootin' 'em for their hides and taller," was the reply.

"Used to be lots, eh?"

"I don't want to tell you about 'em, stranger," replied the pilot, sighing heavily.

"Why?"

"Cause you'd think I was a-lyin' to you, and that's sumthin' I never do. I ken cheat at keards, drink whiskey, or chaw poor terbacker, but I can't lie."

"Then there used to be lots of 'em?" inquired the passenger.

"I'm most afraid to tell ye, Mister, but I've counted 'leven hundred alligators to the mile from Vicksburg c'lar down to Orleans! That was years ago, afore a shot was ever fired at 'em."

"Well, don't doubt it," replied the stranger.

"And I've counted 3,459 of 'em on one sand bar!" continued the pilot. "It looks big to tell, but a Government surveyor was aboard, and he checked 'em off as I called out."

"I haven't the least doubt of it," said the passenger, as he heaved a sigh.

"I'm glad o' that, stranger. Some fellers would think I was a liar, when I'm telling the solemn truth. This used to be a paradise for alligators, and they were so thick that the wheels of the boat killed an average of forty-nine to the mile!"

"Is that so?"

"True as Gospel, mister! I used to almost feel sorry for the cussed brutes, 'cause they'd cry out 'e'en more like a human being. We killed lots of 'em, as I said, and we hurt a pile more. I sailed with one captain who allus carried a thousand bottles of liniment to throw over to the wounded ones!"

"He did?"

"True as you live, he did. I don't 'spect I'll ever see another such a kind, Christian man. And the alligators got to know the Nancy Jane, and to know Capt. Tom, and they'd swim out and rub their tails agin the boat an' purr like cats an' look up and try to smile!"

"They would?"

"Solemn truth, stranger. And once when we grounded on a bar, with an opposition boat right behind, the alligators gathered around, got under her stern, and humped her clean over the bar by a grand push! It looks like a big story, but I never told a lie yet, and I never shall. I wouldn't lie for all the money you could put aboard this boat."

There was a painful pause, and after awhile the pilot continued:

"Our injines gin out once, and a crowd of alligators took a tow-line and hauled us forty-five miles up stream to Vicksburg!"

"They did?"

"And when the news got along the river that Capt. Tom was dead, every alligator in the river daubed his left ear with mud as a badge of mournin', and lots of 'em pined away and died!"

The passenger left the pilot-house with the remark that he didn't doubt the statement, and the old man gave the wheel a turn, and replied:

"Thar's one thing I won't do for love nor money, and that's make a liar of myself I was brung up by a good mother, and I'm going to stick to the truth if this boat doesn't make a cent."—Vicksburg Herald.

THE dentist's epitaph: "He is filling his last cavity."

OREGON has a new town called Pay Up. It is said to be a good place for settlement.

It is said there are more lies told in the sentence, "I am glad to see you," than in any other six words in the English language.

At one of the colored churches in Columbus, Ga., the other night, a woman screamed, "Glory! I'se jest like soda water! I'se bilin' over!"

MANY working men in Canada have been thrown out of employment for this Winter, and many of the new settlers are returning to England.

THERE is a man in Beuna Vista, Ala., who has eleven daughters at home. It takes one hundred and ninety-eight yards of calico to go round.

JAMES LICK has notified the Regents of the University of California that he has decided upon Mount Hamilton as the site for his proposed observatory.

A BALTIMORE servant girl the other morning tried the good old time honored plan of lighting the fire with kerosene. Nothing has benzine of her since.

THIS year's crop of apples in Michigan surpasses anything ever produced there before. From Adrian alone 22,351 barrels were shipped in the month of October.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, the Democrat and Liberal orator, of England, delivered a lecture to a large audience before the New York Liberal Club, Friday evening, Nov. 26th.

A COUNTRY editor says, with apparent truthfulness: "The best paper now issued is the greenbacks signed by Treasurer New. It is difficult, however, to get it on the exchange list."

"MOTHER, does the Lord take the daily papers?" "No, my child; why do you ask so strange a question?" "Well, I thought he didn't—it takes our minister so long to tell him what is going on."

INHABITANTS of the planet Mars can make the tour of the world there dry-shod or in forty days if they have accomplished rapid transit. The land is not divided off in islands as with us, the amount of water being barely enough to form lakes.

MANY very good people are annoyed by sleepiness in church. The following remedy is recommended: Lift the foot seven inches from the floor, and hold it in suspense without support for the limb, and repeat the remedy if the attack returns.

MOODY preached in the Unitarian church in Northfield, Mass., several years ago, and his theme was the atoning blood of Christ. After the service the pastor said to him: "Christ's blood has no more to do with us than the blood of a chicken," and the shocked evangelist has not since preached in a Unitarian church.

If the proposition of abolishing clerical patronage in Prussia is adopted, there will be quite a revolution in the interests of the Church. In connection with the Roman Catholic Church there are over 1,000 ecclesiastical offices in the gift of private patrons, about 500 in that of the State, and 5,200 in that of the bishops.

A PRETTY young lady lawyer of Chicago always declines divorce cases. Her argument on that score is short and sweet, viz.: Every woman who accepts a husband should forever thereafter during life be compelled to live with him, whether ugly, shabby, good, bad or indifferent.

OBJECTION has been expressed, in a Chicago meeting, to the singing of religious verses in the common schools. The Board of Education, which recently stopped the use of the Bible in the schools, is now asked in a petition to revise the singing books, expunging every orthodox sentiment.

THE BROOKLYN REVIVAL is over. The sweet singers—Moody and Sankey—have flown. It is estimated that the revival cost, in money and time, from $50,000 to $100,000. If the good it has produced amounts, at the highest estimate that can be placed upon it, to half that sum, we may all be glad. We know, however, of no class of people who need reformation—a revival of honesty, integrity and decency—more than Christians and preachers themselves.

PROF. TYNDALL's reply to Rev. James Martineau, and which appeared in the Popular Science Monthly for December, is an able, argumentative paper. He is evidently making steady progress to the ultimate position of true Materialism. He is a little hard upon the theories of Spiritualists, but it is to be presumed they will excuse him for the apparent want of charity he evinces in that direction.

THE grape harvest in France is said to have been unprecedented the present season. The owners of large vineyards have been obliged to fill their vats twice, and have now double the usual quantity on hand. None of the vine-growers have any recollection of so abundant a vintage. The quality of the wine has also turned out much better than was expected.

THE Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald says, that at the present rate of increase it is estimated there will be in four years 1,000,000 stands of bees in Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Bernardino counties, which will produce annually 100,000,000 pounds of honey, worth $20,000,000, which is more than the value of the sugar and molasses crop of Louisiana, Texas, and Florida combined.

THERE are enrolled in the public schools of the United States 8,000,000 children. In the last fiscal year the average daily attendance was 4,500,000. Thirty-seven States and eleven Territories report an increase in the public school income of $1,232,000, and in attendance of children 164,000. The total sum raised during the year was $82,000,000, and the cost of public education was about $74,000,000.

PERFUMERS, by blending primary odors, obtain all the various bouquets. Roses, orange blossoms, jasmine, violets, geranium, tuberose, and jonquil, contain types of nearly all flower odors. Blend jasmine and orange flowers, and you get the scent of the sweet pea; asmine and tuberose mixed produce the perfume of hyacinth; while violet and tuberose resemble the lily of the valley.

THE Presbyterians of Jersey City have fully decided that they have no further use for the Rev. John S. Glendinning. He has their concurrent permission to leave. He goes to Henry, Ill., to there perform the work of his "Master." As he has married, it is to be hoped the lone, defenseless young girls in the vicinity where he goes, will not be endangered. The church with which he was connected has changed its deacons, changed its name, and done all it could to wipe out the stigma of the Glendinning disgrace.

AN old lad residing in Ohio lost the companion with whom she had jogged along for many years. She neglected to mark the spot of his burial by even a stone. Not long after coming into possession of a small legacy, a sister of the deceased said to her: "I suppose you will now put up stones for Daniel?" Her answer was a settler. "If the Lord wants anything of Daniel at the resurrection, I guess he can find him without a guideboard! There ain't a speck o' doubt but what the old man'll be on hand in good time."

NONE of the congregation knew she was crazy until she insisted upon singing a solo when the contribution box was being passed around. The unfortunate sexton who attempted to remonstrate with her was nearly knocked down by the hymn-book she threw at his head, and the pastor, when he tried to quiet her, got a fearful blow on the head from her umbrella. Then the congregation came to his aid, but the woman was too much for them all, and escaped from the church. This happened the other day in Pittsburgh.

OREGON has a new cereal which looks like wheat, rye, and barley, and isn't either of them, and the "leading agriculturists" of the State are puzzling themselves about it. Its history is strange. About four years ago a farmer living in Tillamook county, Oregon, killed a wild goose, in whose crop he found a peculiar-looking grain. He planted it: it multiplied wonderfully, and he subsequently raised forty bushels on half an acre of land. Its growth is peculiar, from seven to ten stalks springing from one root. The kernel is very thin and compact, of a bright straw color, and extremely hard.

PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR has taken some notice of the Christian attacks made upon him for his supposed change in theological belief. He says he was once satisfied that the teachings of science and the dogmas of the Church were consistent, but that the theologians have at length convinced him that this is not so, while he is as well satisfied as ever that the teachings of science are right. Notwithstanding this frank explanation, the theologians are not satisfied, and would not be unless he gave the dogmas of theology the foremost position, and science a secondary consideration, and this he can by no means do.

A REVIVAL has been in operation in the Presbyterian church at Bushnell, Ill., at which the excitement was raised so high as to drive John J. Scott crazy, to the extent that he has been taken to the State Insane Asylum at Jacksonville. He was a very worthy man, a kind neighbor, and a good farmer. He owned 60 acres of land, under the highest cultivation. Is it not a pity—is it not a shame, even, that these mischief-making fool-preachers cannot find something better to do than to be roving over the country, driving better men than themselves crazy with their rantings about an angry God, a bleeding Savior, a roaring Devil, and a burning hell?

ANOTHER AMOROUS PASTOR, AND SERIOUS CONSEQUENCES.—Rev. H. O. Hoffman, of Quincy, Ill., so far forgot the conduct due from a moral man, seized a sister (Mrs. Chatten) of his congregation, at whose house he was making a pastoral call, and placed her upon the bed when he attempted, by force, to commit a very improper act. She resisted him with all her strength, and the children making an outcry, he was unsuccessful. A trial followed. Judge Mitchell testified in the case, upon which Mr. Chatten (the husband of the lady), taking umbrage thereat, attacked him on the street and shot him in the head. The Judge was carried home on a shutter, and Mr. Chatten put in prison. Another instance of the sad results of a clergyman's lust.

THE troubles of Brother Beecher and Plymouth Church seem not to be ended. Another trial between Beecher and Tilton is expected soon to come off. Another examination of Beecher's case before a board, or council, of Congregational clergymen is to soon take place, and Mrs. Moulton's application that she have justice done her, in her connection with Plymouth Church, cannot be ignored. Besides, the Loader trial will soon take place, in which it is expected much evidence, touching Beecher's guilt, not heretofore produced, will be brought out. In the meantime, Beecher is extremely orthodox, very full of Jesus, and is rigidly pursuing the policy of silence. He is willing to say nothing in reference to the scandal, if other people will not. He much wants to be let alone. The policy of silence in a case of this kind, smacks very strongly of guill. An innocent person is never afraid to show his hand.

Vicarious Atonement.

In writing upon a subject so sublimely sacred to the orthodox world, and esteemed so vitally important to all mankind, I wish to approach it gently, use plain terms, and present it in its most simple form.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the atonement was made for the sins of the world, and as the whole structure of the Christian religion is based upon faith in this atonement, it may, perhaps, be necessary to go back to the Bible account of creation, and try to acquaint ourselves with the peculiar organizations of our first parents, by whom, it is stated, sin was first introduced into the world.

Here, in their little Eden home we find them, just as God made and placed them there, in a purely childish state of mind, with perfectly balanced organization, no one organ more fully developed than another, not at all capable of using their reasoning faculties, and consequently no more to be blamed for any mistake they might make, than the fondling child upon its mother's lap.

From the third chapter of Genesis, we learn the serpent not Devil, (as Orthodoxy has it) had some conversation with mother Eve, who, in her undeveloped nature, not being yet capable of discriminating between good and evil, did not know whether he was a friend or foe.

After concluding his speech and convincing her that her eyes were somewhat dim, but that they would be opened, and that she would know good and evil, the one great desire of mankind, and just such knowledge too as all good and honest teachers try now to impart, yielded to his counsel, partook of the forbidden fruit, and found the result to be no lie, no false statement, not deceived as we are instructed, but just what the serpent had told her—God, himself, (22nd verse) acknowledging the truthfulness of the statement.—"And the Lord God said, behold the man has become as one of us, to know good and evil, and now lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live forever," was sent out of the garden to till the ground from which he was taken. Query: If man had become as God or like God, to know good and evil, why should he be condemned?

Has it not always been, and ever will be, the great and constant effort of mankind, to gain knowledge and wisdom; to become godlike; able at all times, to distinguish between good and evil?

Does not the Bible, purporting to be God's word, contain numerous passages urging man to become more like him in wisdom and in goodness? Is not Jesus, as stated in Luke, second chapter and fifty-second verse, said to have increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and man? That would imply that he was not always in full favor with God, but as he increased in wisdom he increased in God's favor, just as Eve did, and all mankind do in search of knowledge.

Then, I repeat, why censure the poor, innocent, ignorant woman for doing just what God intended she should do, and what is now acknowledged by all, to meet his approbation, and lay to her charge, the guilt for the sins of the whole world, for which to atone, Christ, another innocent being, is called upon, to suffer and die. Through a false system of education, the Orthodox world is laboring under a very great mistake; for, instead of the transgression, as it is termed, being a curse, it has proved to be one of the greatest blessings. It was the grand stepping-stone to knowledge—the throne of reason.

Admitting, for the time being, the theological idea of human depravity from eating an apple, and the irreconcilable state of man to God, being utterly powerless and unable of himself to better his condition, it seemed, therefore, necessary that something should be done, some means devised by which he could be re-instated to God's favor.

For a very great while sacrifices were made to Jehovah God, by burning the bodies of animals upon an altar erected for that purpose, and the aroma arising therefrom as a sweet-smelling savor into the nostrils of their God, were considered by the Jews sufficient to appease his anger and atone for sin. But in the process of time, after sacrificing thousands of animals, and an attempt at one time to sacrifice a human being—the sins of the world all the while increasing—it was considered necessary to devise some other means by which pardon and redemption might be obtained. Consequently, as already stated, an innocent man was born for that purpose, or, as theology teaches, "God being made manifest in the flesh," was made an offering (to himself) at the hands of his favorite people, to atone for the sins of both Jew and Gentile, to place all mankind with him upon terms of peace and pardon. Hence no more offerings of life were to be made, "he having tasted death once for all." "For this special purpose came he into the world," we are told, "to die, the just for the unjust." Now theologians represent Christ's death upon the cross as unjust, cruel, an ignominious, ungodly act, censuring its perpetrators for the guilty murder of "our Lord."

Let us pause for a moment and consider the correctness of these statements. Isaiah, one of God's prophets, fifty-third chapter, says: "He (Christ) was smitten of God and afflicted," "and with his stripes we are healed." "And the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all."

It is also stated in the fourth chapter of acts, that "There is none other name given under heaven among men, whereby we must be saved."

From the above, and other similar quotations we might give, it is quite apparent that it was a compulsory act on the part of the Jews, they being the instruments simply through which God's plans were to be executed—a means for removing sin from the world. Therefore, according to God's own purposes, they are blameless. They did as did Eve, just what God intended they should do, and as none other than the body of Jesus crucified, could atone for the sins of the world, and it being absolutely necessary that God's plans be executed, they not only did no wrong, but are the greatest benefactors to mankind, the world has ever known. In consideration of the many who, in their benighted zeal to become more spiritual, make the weekly sacrament a part of their worship, who have come to feel that their soul's salvation depends much more upon the sufferings, death and spilt blood of Jesus than upon the good acts of his life, when the Scriptures teach and theologians affirm that, without the shedding of blood, there can be no remission of sins, and that Jesus Christ is made a propitiation for our sins through the shedding of his blood. I say, when the Scriptures are so plain upon this subject, and the absolute importance of such a sacrifice so universally taught, it would seem strange that censure should rest upon any one for doing what seemed so imperatively necessary should be done.

But as the Bible and the Church have condemned the serpent and the woman for bringing sin (knowledge) into the world, so do they condemn the Jews for being God's instruments in expelling it.

Now I think no rational intelligence will assert that the Jews did no wrong in putting to death the body of Christ. On the contrary, they did a great wrong—were guilty of the murder of one of their fellow men, instigated through priestly jealousy toward him, because of his large liberal nature, and the superior ideas he taught.

Not unlike the Protestant priesthood, they, in their infatuated enthusiasm to serve Jehovah, thought they were rendering him sacred service, in destroying such a person from among them. He died as thousands of other good people have died, a martyr to principle—a just God having nothing more to do with it than he would have to do with any other crime. No intelligent God, let me say, would suffer his subjects to get into such a predicament as to require the sacrifice of the life of a human being, to purchase their redemption. The idea of the innocent having to suffer to expiate the sins of the guilty, had its origin in cowardice, ignorance and superstition, and strange, is it not, at this enlightened age of the world, that there are thousands who are bowing the knee, and making daily oblations to this cruel sacrificer of human flesh?

The Church, however, teaches it was love that influenced God to make an offering of his son. Well, the Church may, in its visionary conceptions of the true relationship between God and man, and its tenacious Puritanic reverence for his holy word, imagine a highly offended God to be so moved with pity and compassion for the seeming wants of humanity, as to accept the idea of such a barbarous act being one of genuine charity; but I fail to see any rational display of love in premeditated murder, under any circumstances, while the fact of it having occurred nearly two thousand years ago, does not so palliate the crime as to render it just, and place it upon the plane of love. There are, indeed, so few of the characteristics of an all-wise God represented in this plan of salvation, that I am induced to regard the whole thing as a preludic delusion gotten up at the expense of ignorance and superstition.

It is furthermore stated that Christ gave himself, a willing sacrifice, which statement is contradicted by his own words when he plead with his God in the garden of Gethsemane if it were possible to relieve him from this penalty of suffering, and continuing his entreaties upon the cross while undergoing the agonies of death, crying to him, in tones of bitter anguish to know why he was forsaken. If the God, of whom Jesus was a part, yea whose life was his own, was so deaf to the dying prayer of his only child while in the hands of cruel assassins, what may those, whose lives are less dear to him by the ties of nature, whose petitions for succor are daily ascending, have reason to expect? If an imaginary God (as all Gods are imaginary who can't be seen or felt,) should become angry, and so displeased with the work of his own hands, as to require sacrifices of life to appease that anger, and reconcile to him, a people of his own begetting—and still further to require the life of an innocent person in whom, it is said, no guile was found—in a pathological sense, would be regarded in a morbid state of mind, with the organ of destructiveness largely preponderating.

Such was undoubtedly true in the case of the Jehovah God, who seemed never better satisfied, than when engaged in the slaughter and massacre of those whom he regarded his enemies; not confining his rage to the male adult population, but causing to be put to death, innocent women and children, often-times subjecting them to the most infamous and cruel tortures that could be thought of. Nor yet even were his blood-thirsty desires satiated, but would frequently command whole herds of animals to be slaughtered for no other reason simply, than that they had previously belonged to his enemies.

The Old Testament scriptures abound in accounts of bloody wars instigated at his command, and he is frequently spoken of in both the Old and New Testaments, as being a jealous God, a God of malice, anger, etc., and greatly to be feared for his austerity, and highly extolled for his superior wisdom. However, on one occasion he was so much influenced by a speech he had the pleasure of listening to from his servant, Moses, that "he repented of the evil which he in his wrath was about inflicting upon his children." I can form no conceptions of a truly infinite loving father becoming so stupid in the management of his own affairs, as to be obliged to resort to such an overt act of cruelty and degradation in order to again effect a proper relationship between himself and his children—while the great sin of unbelief in such absurdities, has led to many bloody persecutions, and is today the prime cause of selfishness and bigotry.

The blind reverence for things considered sacred, which in early life are so forcibly impressed upon the mind, I am truly thankful to know, are all the while being outgrown. I hold no book so sacred, the contents of which will not bear the closest scrutiny, and the profoundest criticism—which to doubt a part of, or call in question its entire truthfulness, would be to be damned. Neither can I accept any theory or statement of facts as true, until logically and scientifically proven.

Obituary.

BY M. P. ROSECRANS.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR.—Supposed to have died about two thousand four hundred and thirty-seven years ago, in the great city of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar. Age unknown to us.

While writing the above we felt sad, we felt bowed down with grief; we felt like uttering loud lamentations; we felt and still feel, like a hired mourner at a rich man's funeral; we almost see before our eyes the pomp and style attendant upon the solemn cortege surrounding the dead carcass of a king; we fancy we can hear the wails and sobs, the howls and yells of the wives and concubines of the dead king, of the near and dear favorites of royalty.

The king is dead, lies before us powerless, his wives are all widows, his concubines must now seek some other paramour.

While the dead king lies before us, dressed in the regalia of State, Belshazzar, the son, is crowned in his stead, succeeds to his estate, to his robes and garments of royalty; and all this took place, all this transpired within the short period of two thousand five hundred years; a time so short it seems but yesterday to us. Had the subject of our thought been poor, the time would seem longer, we could scarcely call the fact to mind at all, for this reason: poor men seldom have their history written, their words recorded; seldom have visions or dreams that are remarkable, that are worthy of interpretation; seldom have costly display at their funerals; are seldom laid out in state; have hired carriages or hired mourners. The poor actor whose funeral was preached in the "little church around the corner," has almost passed out of mind, while Nebuchadnezzar, the great, the mighty king of Babylon, stands before us bright and distinct as the sun when the sky is clear at noon-day.

Yes, dear reader, Adam was remarkable as the first man, the father of the race; Eve as the mother of all mankind; Noah as an artisan, a ship-builder, a preserver of animal life; Job as full of patience while covered with boils, and in the immediate presence of a scolding wife; Jonah as a sailor-preacher, who came near losing his life on the briny deep; Samson for his great strength and skill as a fox hunter. All these had their peculiarities, incidents in their history which were remarkable, and all of which were intended for our instruction to teach us great lessons; but it remained for Nebuchadnezzar to outshine them all, in riches, in power, in glory, in grandeur and dominion; in dreams, and in their remarkable interpretation; in change of diet and appearance, in having his heart changed to that of an ox.

Poor Neb! We see you seated high on the throne of a great empire! We see you subjects bow before this throne dazzled with its brightness and its glory; we see you dressed in the robes of royalty, the crown of gold upon your head, the scepter of power in your hand; an empire's weal or woe depend upon your nod or your smile. We see by your order an image made, and this image by your decree becomes a God. This image was of pure gold, was ninety feet high, and nine feet in breadth.

If but one foot in thickness this image contained 810 cubic feet of pure gold, and yet the treasury was still full, money was still plenty. We only mention this fact to show his great riches, his great power and the amount of gold at his command.

Were he living in our day and age of the world as the possessor of all that gold, he would be able to control Grant, Stewart, Tom Scott, Vanderbilt, and all the railroad interest in this republican government. He would have gold enough to convert the Turks, the Arabs and Hindoos, and still there would be enough left to control a few elections and put 'God in the Constitution of the United States.

No wonder Neb. became proud and haughty, arrogant and overbearing. No wonder he had dreams and visions.

In his case riches didn't take to themselves wings and fly away, but he took to himself feet and walked away. He left the habitations of men and abode with cattle, or in other words he turned himself out to grass; he became to all intents and purposes an ox and did eat grass with cattle. Whether he chewed his cud we cannot say; neither do we know of his fitness for market. Had this happened in our day he would have had an owner, he would have been taken up as an estray, would have had to chew hay and straw during the cold and tedious winters.

We once read stories of this nature in the Arabian tales. We read of Genii and their powers. We read of men and women by magic power being turned into apes, dogs and other animals. We were interested in these matters; we read with eagerness and delight, and were sorry to be told they were works of fiction—were not true; we felt bad and refused to be comforted. We read of Alladin and his wonderful lamp, and we were sorry that the story was not true, for we did not know but we might sometime own such a lamp; but our ardor met with a check, our aspirations have had time to cool. We laid aside fiction and sought after truth, we found the story of King Neb. and are satisfied.

If he had not Genii he had gold, the power that moves the world; and were we to make a God for people to worship we could choose no better metal. As for the transmigration or change, his was as remarkable, as strange, as can be found in the works of fiction. His stomach was changed entirely; and here we must wonder, when in after years he was restored to his kingdom, his pomp his power and his glory, whether he did not have a fellow feeling for the ox; whether he could eat beef without remorse; or when he passed a rich pasture field he did not feel a hankering for grass?

We have all this to think and ponder upon. Whenever we see an ox we can't help thinking of this story, we do not know but we hold some king in disguise—some greatness humbled. This sad obituary has attached to it a moral. It teaches us that riches are not always available; that kings are no better than other men; that all the works of fiction are not fiction; that men that are proud, vain, and full of egotism would appear to better advantage if turned out to grass; that none but the rich have a history, and upon this sad story hangs a tale: That upon the visions of King Neb. rests the divine theory of this world's inglorious and ignoble dissolution.

Farewell to King Neb!—To-day your grave is unhonored, your resting place is unknown; and yet the grass grows just as green and the dew falls as sweetly as when in the pastures of Babylon you fed with the cattle and ate grass like the ox till seven times had passed over your head, and the writer of this obituary desiring to close with a Latin sentence, says:

"Requiescat in pace."

Infidelity Vindicated.

Infidels, foes everywhere and forever of kings and priests; Infidels, the saviors of liberty; Infidels gave mankind the sublime Declaration of American Independence—a Government without a Church, and a Constitution without a God. In every land, through all the dark and dreary centuries of chains and whip and fire, liberty was ever the watchword of the Infidel. Religion, in every age, has been the synonym of slavery. Infidelity is liberty; all religion is slavery. The Infidel has ever been found battling for the rights of man—the priest ever reeking with the gore of heretics. The Church damned men—Infidelity reformed them. The Church established inquisitions—Infidelity founded universities. But it is said that Infidels tear down, destroy. True; they have torn down the stakes and crosses and gibbets that, like a forest, hedged in the rugged road of Progress, and have raised telegraph poles in their stead. They have dethroned kings, and enthroned man; they have rolled back the unwieldy stone which the Church placed at the sepulchre of Liberty; they have destroyed the thumbscrews and racks and torture dungeons of the Church, and put out the fagot fires in which Torquemada and John Calvin slowly roasted thinkers and discoverers. Whatever has been done for the prosperity and advancement of man, has been done by the few heroic Infidels, in spite of all the persecutions of priests and popes and potentates. While that insatiate monster, called Christianity, has strewn the fair fields of earth with the wrecks of armies and the bones of murdered millions, converted populous nations into deserts and transformed our beautiful world into a slaughter-house, drenched with blood and tears. Infidelity has been the creator of science, the preserver of art, and the guardian of the ark of freedom. Infidelity is religion—the religion of goodness. "The world is my country, to do good my religion," was the life motto of that grand, heroic Infidel, Thomas Paine. The Church repeats creeds—Infidelity does good. The Church persecutes people because of their honest belief. Infidelity makes religious duties consist in "doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make their fellow creatures happy."

Infidelity has enfranchised the human mind, has rescued the world from the midnight of mediæval superstition, and the monuments of Infidels are the mile-stones along the highway of Progress.

We are indebted to Infidels for this American Republic, its liberal institutions, and for civil and religious liberty. The "Author Hero" of the revolution was an Infidel. The author of the "Age of Reason" first wrote "The Free and Independent States of America." Yes, thanks to the heroic Infidels gone before us, who bared their breasts to all the blighting blasts of bigotry and persecution, and who with a splendid courage, dared to do and suffer and die, civil and religious liberty have been vouchsafed the world to-day. Fallen along the roadside of the centuries are the stakes and crosses and fagot piles. Quenched forever is the bigot's brand. No longer are men unjointed, crushed and mangled, or torn by red hot pincers, because they cannot comprehend the mystery of godliness. No longer do loving and tender and beautiful women rot in iron chains for Christ's sake. It was the grand old Infidels of other years, whose unfaltering feet left their blood-prints along the rugged road of investigation, whose flame-bleached bones whitened all the Mt. Calvaries of Truth and Discovery, who secured the right of the race to think and speak; they cherished and consecrated the ark of mental freedom amidst the fiercest flames of persecution, and passed it on, a priceless legacy, from one to another through all the sweeping storms of the years, safely down to us.

Extract from Shelley.

Is there a God?—aye, an almighty God,
And vengeful as almighty! Once his voice
Was heard on earth: earth shuddered at the sound;
The fiery-visaged armament expressed
Abhorrence, and the grave of nature yawned,
To swallow all the dauntless and the good
That dared to hurl defiance at his throne,
Girt as it was with power. None but slaves Survived—cold-blooded slaves, who did the work
Of tyrannous omnipotence; whose souls
No honest indignation ever urged
To elevated daring, to one deed
Which gross and sensual self did not pollute.
The slaves built temples for the omnipotent fiend,
Gorgeous and vast; the costly altars smoked
With human blood, and hideous peans rung
Through all the long aisles. A murderer heard
His voice in Egypt, one whose gifts and arts
Had raised him to his eminence and power,
Accomplice of omnipotence in crime,
And confident of the all-knowing one.
These were Jehovah's words:
From an eternity of idleness
I, God, awoke; in six day's toil make earth!
From nothing; rested and created man:
I placed him in a paradise, and there Planted the tree of evil, so that he Might eat and perish, and my soul procure
Wherewith to sate its malice, and to turn.
Even like a heartless conqueror of the earth,
All misery to my fame. The race of men
Chosen to my honor, with impunity
May sate the lusts I planted in their heart.
Here I command thee hence to lead them on.
Until with hardened feet, their conquering troops
Wade on the promised soil through woman's blood.
And make my name be dreaded through the land.
Yet ever-burning flame and ceaseless woe
Shall be the doom of their eternal souls.
With every soul on this ungrateful earth.
Virtuous or vicious, weak or strong—even all Shall perish to fulfill the blind revenge (Which you, to men, call justice) of their God.

The name of God
Has fenced about all crime with holiness.
Himself the creation of his worshippers,
Whose names, and attributes, and passions change,
Siva, Buddha, Foh, Jehovah, God, or Lord,
Even with the human dupes who build his shrines,
Still serving o'er the war-polluted world
For desolation's watchword: whether hosts Stain his death-blushing chariot-wheels, as on Triumphantly they roll, whilst Brahmins raise
A sacred hymn to mingle with the groans;
Or countless partners of his power divide
His tyranny to weakness; or the smoke
Of burning towns, the cries of female helplessness,
Unarmed old age, and youth, and infancy,
Horribly massacred, ascend to heaven
In honor of his name; or, last and worst,
Earth groans beneath religions iron age.
And priests dare babble of a God of peace,
Even while their hands are red with guiltless blood,
Murdering the while, uprooting every germ
Of truth, exterminating, spoiling all,
Making the earth a slaughter-house.

"THE hardest trial of my life," said good old deacon Barnes, "was to shed tears at the news that my wife's uncle had died and left her $50,000."

Fraternity of Jesus Christ.

Every day I hear and read, with astonishment, about the fraternity taught by Jesus Christ and preached in the Gospel.

I meet with Liberals, Freethinkers, Atheists, Spiritualists, Sociologists, Progressists, of any kind, who, invariably, recognize, praise, extol, the so-called fraternity of Jesus Christ.

This is a baleful illusion. It is time to put an end to such errors, which, when committed by Progressists, do not only lead to silliness and ridiculousness, but lead also to calamities, miseries and pernicious defeat.

The fraternity of Jesus Christ is the fraternity of Cain. Listen to what the Gospel teaches and preaches: "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you nay; but rather division." (Luke, chap. xii. 51.)

"For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law." (Matt. chap. x. 35.)

"I am come to send fire on earth; and what will I, that it be already kindled." (Luke, chap. xii. 49.)

"For from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three."

The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law." (Luke, chap. xii. 52-53.)

"If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." (Luke, chap. xiv. 26.)

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I come not to send peace, but a sword." (Matt. chap. x. 34.)

"And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children shall rise up against their parents and cause them to be put to death." (Matt. chap. x. 21.)

"For I say unto you, that unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him." (Luke, chap. xix. 26.)

"But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me." (Luke, chap. xix. 27.)

Have you enough of it? I refer those more curious, more particular or not sufficiently satisfied, to Matthew, chapter x. xviii. and xv.; and to Luke, chapter xii. xiv., xxi. and xxii. As for the commentaries and annotations upon those words of Jesus Christ, written by the saints and fathers of the church, it would be impossible to republish them in ten years, even if THE TRUTH SEEKER was a daily paper.

Such is the fraternity preached by Jesus Christ and the Gospel! And it has for sanction fifteen centuries of bloodshed and persecution, a seal of carnage and extortion!

If somewhere Jesus Christ has said: "Love one another," this was only a counsel of union given to his accomplices, the future conquerors of the world. Thus, in his cavern, a chief of robbers recommends to his companions, reciprocal honesty.

Fraternity is of human origin and of human essence. It existed before Jesus Christ. And all the efforts of this divine personage will not prevail against it. I quote at a venture, from the pagans: "The largest of all profits is to love one another."—Xenophon.

"Do not harm any one. Benevolence agrees with justice."—Theognis.

"Be to every one kind and friendly."—Antonius.

"Give to every one what is owing to him."—Simonides.

"A just man is he who thinks himself born for the benefit of his fellow-creature."—Euripides.

"Do not to others what you would not like others to do to you; and act towards others as you would have them act towards you."—Socrates, and fifty others.

Let us then give to God what belongs to God, that is, theft, murder, havoc, massacre. And let us restore to man what belongs to man, that is, fraternity.

OTTER CORDATES.

FIGHT TO THE END.—A colored preacher in this vicinity recently addressed his congregation at a revival meeting as follows: "Now my moanin' frens, you comes heal an' you moanis, an' rolls, an' habs a mighty struggle wid de debbil, night arter night, an' when you's might near loose you gits right up an' goes right back into de debbil's arms agin. Now I tells you, my frens, dat won't do: you neber git away from de deb il dat way. You's jis like d lightnin' bug! When you git down an' moan' an' roll, an' holler, you shows your light, like de lightnin bug do, when he raise his tail an' spread his wings. When you gits up an' goes roun' laughin' an' talkin', an' foolin' wid de debbil you puts your light under de bushel, and yo' jis like de lightnin' bug when he shuts down his wings. Den he ain't no' mo' like a lightnin' bug dan any odder bug, an' you knows it. Now, let's not hab any mo' ob d lightnin'-bug business, but git down to work agin de deb in yearnest. Jackson Sun."

The Bible. No. xxxi.

SHADRACH, MESHACH AND ABED-NEGO.

For hundreds of years there have been two classes of men who have given their time and attention to fire and to fire-works. One class are styled pyrotechnists, and it is their business to get up all varieties of fire-works, embracing rockets, fire-wheels, Roman candles etc., in which colored lights, stars and fiery sprays are artistically blended, sometimes attended with loud detonations; in which chlorate of potash, nitrate of potash, phosphorus, fulminating mercury, per-oxide of manganese, sulphur, carbon and various other chemicals are used. The skill employed in this branch of business is very considerable, and most brilliant and showy effects are produced. The avocation, unfortunately, however, is a very hazardous one, and many a man employed in the business, has been killed outright or shockingly mutilated; and many a building, in which this kind of work has been prosecuted, has been destroyed or greatly damaged by explosions and ignitions connected with this dangerous manufacture. Insurance companies are extremely disinclined to take risks on property of this extra hazardous character.

The other class have been called "fire kings," and they are those who by the application of alum and other substances which are non-conductors to the surfaces of the body, are enabled to endure an incredible amount of heat—to step on red hot bars of iron, to handle heated metals, apply them to the tongue, and take fire in various ways into the mouth etc., etc.

It is astonishing how great a degree of heat the living organization is capable of enduring. Men have gone into ovens hot enough to roast beef, and have remained there while the meat roasted. We do not, at this moment, remember the highest degree of heat the human system has been submitted to without apparent injury; but it is above two hundred and twelve degrees, Fahrenheit, at which point water boils. The resisting power of living organization is so great, that a man will emerge in a sound condition from a heated oven, as we observed, where flesh, deprived of life, would soon be cooked through and through.

India and Europe have boasted in times past of several of these fire-kings, whose astonishing powers of endurance have excited the wonder of large assemblages. Some thirty years ago, or more, this city had one of these curiosities—a Frenchman by the name of Chaubert—who, on many occasions, exhibited his powers in this direction before considerable numbers. Despite his charlatanry, he really was able to endure a high degree of heat with but slight injury, and gave a fair representation of the extremely high temperature a human being is capable of enduring for a short period.

There is, however, a limit to the possibility of human endurance in heated air or in close proximity to fire. There is a point which cannot be transcended with any degree of safety. The unnumbered thousands of human beings who have been burned at the stake, and others who have been accidentally caught in burning buildings, ships and steamboats, most conclusively prove that human flesh will burn if submitted to a hot fire; and there is no help for it.

The most remarkable "fire kings" that have been heard of—those who were able to "stand fire" vastly better than Chaubert or any other fire expert, living or dead, or in any age of the world, were the three Hebrew children, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah, whom the prince of Nebuchadnezzar's eunuchs, renamed, Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego. The story of their being thrown into a fiery furnace is so well known, we hardly need to repeat it.

Nebuchadnezzar, the king of the Chaldeans, notwithstanding Daniel had told him his dream and the interpretation thereof, after which he seemed to acknowledge Daniel's God, did not seem to give his full adhesion to the same, but desired to have a god of his own and one he could compel the people to bow down to. So he created a god of gold, sixty cubits high. If a cubit is eighteen inches, the golden god was ninety feet in height, and fourteen feet across; and if a cubit is twenty-two inches, as some Bible scholars claim, the god was one hundred and ten feet high and sixteen and a half feet across—a most respectable god indeed, so far as size and material both were concerned. The account does not say whether the god was hollow or solid; but if it was solid, it assuredly contained wealth enough in itself to pay off the national debts of both England and the United States. He was a God that most any worshiper might bow down to. We think we know many Christians who would bow very low before such an amount of gold. In fact, they seem to be as susceptible to the magic influence of this aureate deity as any class of people in the world. There have, probably, been no races of men since this earth has been inhabited, who have been more devoted, persistent and servile worshipers of the golden god, than Jews and Christians. If a Nebuchadnezzar could now set up such a god in our Central Park, or at the Capitol at Washington, Christians and Jews from all parts of the land would flock to its shrine and bow in profound and subservient adoration to the god of Gold, especially if they could be allowed to saw off or detach certain parts of the image and carry the same away with them.

Not so with the three Hebrew young men. They were made of stern stuff and would not bow, even to gold. At this, the King with the long name, became very angry and proceeded to carry out the threat he had made. He caused the three boys to be bound, and had strong men of his army to throw them into a fiery furnace, made seven times hotter than usual. The heat of the furnace can be imagined, when it is remembered it was so great, that the mighty men who were compelled to throw the three boys in, though they approached only the mouth of the furnace, were utterly destroyed. But the young men who went to the very heart of the furnace, were not burned nor scorched in the slightest degree. Not even a hair of their heads, nor a thread of their garments was singed at all. It seems their flesh was not only invulnerable to the fire, but the fabrics of which their apparel was composed, were equally secure from its effects. They were the most complete fire-proof mortals that were ever heard of, and could "stand fire" far better than any of their competitors in any age of the world. Salamanders—fabulous animals, said to live in the fire, could not have stood that extreme heat—seven times greater than the furnace had ever been made before. Thermometers were not invented at that time, so the precise heat which that furnace reached was never known, but as it was seven times hotter than it was wont to be heated, and as six hundred degrees, Fahrenheit, is not an unusual degree for a furnace to reach, some four thousand degrees may be supposed to have been reached—a higher altitude on the scale, than is often attained. It must have started the perspiration freely.

It may be supposed, it was not a good place to receive company, but, unseemly as it was, they had a visitor, and the King, looking in and seeing not only the three safe and sound, but a fourth there also, was justly surprised. He said "the form of the fourth was like the Son of God." What he, a heathen king, who had been only in the metal god business, could know about the form of a son of God, is a little mysterious. It may well be supposed, of all men in the world, Nebuchadnezzar would be about the last that could have any true conception of what the "Son of God" would be like. But it is Daniel who tells the story, and if he is great at all, it is in mysteries and large stories. How the King could see into the fiery furnace and perceive who were there, is more than we can explain. Furnaces are not so constructed that people standing away from the effects of the heat can look into them so as to see if men were there walking about. But we know not in what form the Chaldeans made their furnaces; they may have constructed them upon the plan that the Christians in Spain arranged their au-to-de-fe or human burning on a large scale, so that the kings, nobles and the numerous spectators who attended the exhibition, could easily witness the writhings and contortions of the unhappy wretches consigned to the relentless flames. As in this case, the committing of human beings to a fiery furnace, may have been one species of public amusement for gala-day purposes. It is hard to believe, however, that they were people of such cruelty, or that their taste could have been so abhorrent. That kind of amusement was principally reserved for Christians of a later time.

It may be asked then, do we believe the story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego withstanding the effects of that intensely heated furnace? Yes, we believe it to be an untruth; untrue because it is opposed to all our experience and utterly at variance with nature's laws. In all cases where human beings have been submitted to flames of fire or to a degree of heat more intense than the living organization is able to withstand, they have invariably been overcome with the heat, and their lives destroyed. As in the thousands upon thousands of cases of burning doomed heretics at the hands of merciful Christians one thousand years ago, five hundred years ago, or three hundred years ago, God never in one case interfered with the laws or forces of nature to prevent fire from causing death, we do not believe he did three thousand years ago. It is the nature of fire to destroy organized life, and we cannot think that God has ever interfered to prevent it. It is not his province to set his own laws aside for Jew, Chaldean, Christian or Turk.

We much more readily believe the whole thing to be "one of our Dan's big stories," or the story of some unknown person, who drew entirely upon his imagination, and whose vagaries were attributed to Daniel, and by some means became incorporated into the Jewish sacred writings. We feel under no more obligation to believe an impossible story in one book than in another. Had the Jews been scarce of material of which to compose their sacred writings, and had adopted the Arabian Nights, or any portion of them, we should have been compelled to reject them, and to disbelieve their exaggerated and impossible recitals, and conclude that the laws of God, or the laws of Nature are never set aside by any power in existence.

Possibly we are a little like the negro blacksmith who had recently gotten religion at a revival, and needs must be inducted into the "true faith," and into the "mysteries of godliness." He listened with rapt attention to the accounts of the creation of the world in six days from nothing; of the great calamity our first parents brought upon themselves and their numerous posterity, of eating an apple, by the persuasions of a snake; that God repented of the job he had performed, and decided to destroy the entire human and animal races, except two of a kind, saved in an ark, and that the waters descended all over the earth and covered it to the tops of the highest mountain; how Moses and Aaron produced the plagues of Egypt, pertaining to the frogs, the lice, the locusts and the turning of all the water of the land into blood; how to let the Israelites escape from the country, the Red Sea opened, the waters standing up on either side like a wall, so that near a million of people could walk through on dry land; how for forty years this vast number of people were fed in the wilderness upon manna daily sent from heaven; about Joshua's stopping the sun and moon in their courses, that he might have a few more hours of daylight to destroy his enemies; about Samson tearing open the jaws of a lion with his own hands, and finally pulling down a large temple by removing two pillars at once, and with his own strength; how Elijah caused no rain to fall upon the earth for three years and a half, and was afterwards taken up bodily in a fiery chariot into heaven; about Elisha causing the destruction of forty-two children by two she-bears, and his afterwards bringing a dead man to life, and causing iron to swim. He was told also about Jonah being swallowed by a whale and remaining in the stomach of the fish for three days, when he was vomited up on dry land.

All these narrations he listened to with close attention, as they were explained to him, and he frequently asked questions about the wonderful occurrences when he failed to get a correct understanding, and he thought that, as all these things were written in the word of God, he could believe them to be true. When the story was told of the three Hebrew children being thrown into a burning hot furnace where they received not the slightest harm, he hesitated somewhat. He had had some experience with fire, and had found out its merciless character—that it would burn whatever was thrown in it, that was susceptible of being burned, and he was disposed to enquire into the facts of this particular case.

"Does yer mean to tell me," said he, "dat dem tree men was trown in dat red hot funace, an' didn't burn up?"

"That is true; not a hair of their heads was scorched."

"What's dat you'se a telling me! not a ha'r o' dere head, nor tread o' dere clo'es burnt?"

"Just so."

"An' dey was trown rite in dat bilin' hot, roarin' funace, an' 't never burnt 'em tall?"

"Precisely so. The fire never harmed them in the least."

"Now look ahere," said the negro, "I can't bleve dat. It can't be true. Fire'll burn, for I'se tried it; I don't bleve dis yere ol' fire story, no how; an' now, since I think more about it, I don't bleve none o' dem oder big stories you'se been tellin' me, noder!"

Letter from a Christian.

[We think we should have no doubt of the following being a Christian letter, from its language and style.]

OFFICE OF ERASTUS F. BROWN. }
Counsellor at Law, 76 Nassau St. }
NEW YORK, Nov. 8th, 1875.

D. M. BENNETT—Sir: Your "Open Letter" to My Master has been handed to me. When you say that you write the letter because "I am in quest of truth," you tell a deliberate lie. When you say, "I was in the habit of addressing you regularly four or five times a day, and from one year's end to another," I believe you lie. But be it so, why apply to Christ, keeping company, as you unquestionably do, with your father the Devil. Go to him who troubles my Master, with your lying tongue. Let me give you two words of advice. BE DECENT.

Not your friend, ERASTUS F. BROWN.

REPLY.—We are sorry that the zeal of this pious Christian, in the cause of his "Master," should induce him to forget the manners of a gentleman. We have not been guilty of falsehood in the direction he charges us with it. When he accuses us of "lying," he commits the very offense himself which he charges upon us. We are assuredly in quest of truth, and though we hardly expected to receive a reply to our "Open Letter" from the person addressed, we will be very glad to have the questions answered by some one who calls him "Master." When Mr. Brown insinuates that we lied, in reference to the frequency of the prayers we formerly offered, we can positively assert, that he is in error; and we ought to know a good deal more about it than he does. As a statement of truth, and not as boasting, we assure Erastus that for nearly a score of years we prayed regularly every day on rising in the morning, upon retiring at night, and at each meal we ate, besides frequently on extra occasions. Did he never hear of the like before? It is possible we are quite as well acquainted with his "Master" as he is. Has he any right to question us as to why we appeal to his "Master?" Have we not the same right as himself and all other persons in this direction? Has he any patent for addressing his "Master" that we have to purchase before we can use it?

The gentleman charges us with keeping company with the Devil. He may be correct in that, so far as we are able to say; but we have no recollection of ever meeting his Satanic Majesty, and we think we could not easily have forgotten it had we ever met him; as we have so often heard him spoken of, that we would esteem him quite a curiosity to see. From all that we can learn of the individual in question, he has been shamefully abused and slandered by such men as Mr. Brown, and so far as our choice is concerned, we would quite as soon keep his company as that of Erastus himself, believing him to be fully as much a gentleman and quite as much our friend.

As to the Devil being our father, our assailant is obviously in the wrong, for his assertion is in direct opposition to the evidence of our mother, who certainly knows altogether more about the matter than Erastus possibly can. She said our father was an entirely different personage, who neither had a cloven foot, a horned head, nor a long, barbed tail. She is still living, and we can substantiate our position and prove the legal gentleman's error by her affidavit, if he would be in the least gratified thereby. On that aged parent's account, we regret that he should have made such an untruthful, uncalled-for statement, and one that reflects so seriously upon her early character.

Mr. Brown says another thing that we cannot help regretting; and that is, that he is not our friend. That is sad; we would that all men (including lawyers) might esteem us a friend. We would rather have the good-will of a dog than his ill-will, especially if he is a cross, biting dog. If, however, Erastus insists upon breaking friendship with us, simply because we saw fit to write a letter to his "Master," we shall be obliged to submit to it with the best possible grace, and feel compensated with the conviction that he loses quite as much by the operation as we do. But if his "Master" manifests no ill-will towards us for writing the letter, is it necessary for Erastus to get so "huffy" about it? Does he expect to gain a crown, or a pearl, or a diamond, or a star, by his zealous defence of one who is supposed to be able to take care of himself? By-the way he flutters, one might be led to suppose he was slightly hit.

But is Erastus F. following the injunctions of his "Master," who is reported to have said, "Love those who hate you and despitefully use you"? Does he not rather evince the same intolerant spirit which men of his caste were actuated by two or three centuries ago, when they persecuted, tortured, burned and otherwise put to death hundreds of thousands of those whom they supposed lacked in due respect to their "Master," thus making cruel barbarians of themselves? Is it not probable that had Mr. Brown lived a few centuries earlier, that in his holy zeal for his "Master," he would have joined hand in hand with Torquemada, Montfort, Alva, Calvin, Munzer, Claverhouse and more of that class who reddened their hands and deluged the earth with the blood of their hapless fellow-mortals, because they fancied their "Master" was not properly treated? Does he not evince, in proportion to the age in which he lives, the same intolerance, the same want of charity and the same barbarism that those bloody persecutors, murderers and assassins did? Would not the same spirit which induces a man to-day, to say in anger to a truthful person, "You are a deliberate liar, you have wronged my "Master," have caused him three hundred years ago to say, "I will take your life on my Master's account"?

The way this earth has been saturated with human blood in the name of that "Master," is a terror to every thoughtful, sympathetic mind. The cruelty that has been inflicted upon the human race in the name of that "Master" far transcends all the cruelties, wrongs, and outrages the world has known.

We presume Erastus F. Brown is naturally an amiable, reasonable, kind-hearted person; but the bundle of dogmas, superstitions and errors which he fondly and ignorantly presses to his bosom, and which he fancies is religion and virtue makes him what he is. When he attains—as we hope he may—to the advanced light and morality we have gained, he may become as good a man as we are, and be able to depend upon his own good deeds, instead of his "Master's."

In closing, he was kind enough to give us two words of advice; we will give him more. Erastus: remember that epithets and hard names are no argument; try and get your eyes open to see the truth and have a little common sense.

To the reader we will say, the above letter was drawn out by our "Open Letter to Jesus Christ." It is issued in tract form, and mailed at five cents each, or forty cents a dozen.

We have inadvertently neglected to notice the advent of a new Spiritualistic paper of small dimensions, entitled "The Investigator," a weekly, at one dollar a year. It is ably conducted by our friend John A. Lant, at 33 Park Row. Room 33. May it prove a success.

The Ills We Endure, their Cause and Cure.

Among the crying evils of our time, is the spirit of extravagance and the disposition to contract indebtedness. It begins with the individual farmer, mechanic and merchant; it is fearfully apparent in corporations, cities and municipalities; it is an evil with which every State is more or less troubled, and finally our National Government is sadly involved in the same evil. And so it is with nearly all the governments and nations of the world. All are loaded down with a weight of debt, which, like an incubus, hangs heavily upon their necks. Generations must pass away before this gigantic evil can be fully removed; and unless reformatory measures are adopted, the wrong will be more aggravated and still more widely extended.

This city alone has an onerous debt of $150,000,000 in round numbers, saddled upon it, and our neighboring city of Brooklyn has nearly $50,000,000 weighing her down; and in a similar manner nearly every city and incorporated town in the country has, through the criminal operations and mismanagement of local rings, and designing, intriguing parties, loaded themselves heavily with debt. Many counties and townships, nearly all railroad companies and similar corporations are in the same predicament. The mania to run in debt has been general, and the evil has become wide-spread.

To pay the interest upon this immense indebtedness is a heavy burden upon the people, even if the evil can be stayed where it is, and is a burden which the laboring classes have to carry. The dishonesty and thieving with which much of this has been accomplished, is appalling, and assuredly is enough to shake confidence in humanity, to its very center. When is it to end, and where is the great remedy? Is there a hope of escape from this burden, or must we ever submit to it without relief?

Closely allied with this evil is the still greater one of dishonesty, fraud, and thieving in public servants, which has rapidly increased within the last twenty-five years. It pervades all grades and classes of officials, with very few exceptions, from city policemen and ward-officers to the legislators of States and to Congressmen, Senators, Cabinet officers, and even the Executive himself, whose salary, like the salaries of many other high officials, has been doubled, and who, from a very poor man, has become, in a few years, a millionaire. Almost every public officer seeks places of trust to avail himself of the facilities which the position affords him to plunder and steal from the public purse, and thereby, instead of serving the best interests of the public, to increase his own wealth—his own dishonest gains. To such an extent has this mammoth grievance been carried, that it has become almost a dishonor to hold official positions in the nation. If a man's name is mentioned who has filled the office of Indian Agent, Congressman, a Secretaryship, or many other places of public trust, the question at once presents itself to the mind, has not that man, like all the rest of his compeers, filled his own pockets from the public treasury? It is the saddest aspect of modern civilization, that gross dishonesty is greatly on the increase, and that promotion to office is a most prolific source of theft, and is the channel in which it largely fattens at the public expense.

These are becoming a grave question; how much has our system of theology to do with all this corruption and crime? How much is the faith which teaches the believer that he secures a seat in heaven—not by his own merits and good deeds, but by the righteousness of another individual, responsible for the code of morals that now rules the land? Is it calculated to inaugurate and encourage honesty, to teach people that they can secure the most valuable riches, the highest degrees of happiness of which the mind is capable of conceiving, without any exertions of their own, but by the labors and sufferings of another?

Is it natural that people should pursue an honest course through life, when they are taught from their mother's knees, in the Sunday schools, and at every church they attend, during childhood, youth and ma-

Appeal to Readers of The Truth Seeker.

BY G. L. HENDERSON.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: At a time when many old mercantile houses, banks, and manufactories are closing their doors on account of "hard times," the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has the audacity to propose issuing his paper every week, instead of twice a month as heretofore. Many supposed that when THE TRUTH SEEKER moved from Paris, Ill., to New York, that it would not survive one year. It is true that the ghosts of a thousand defunct papers still haunt Nassau street and "Park Row." Even the Golden Age, with all its editorial ability, could not outlive the present crisis. How, then, shall we account for the continued existence of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which dares to continue the "struggle for life" among so many difficulties and so many competitors, to say nothing of the numerous books, tracts, and leaflets it is bringing out?

This iconoclastic paper has had no fat advertisements in its columns; no political ring at its back; no wealthy church organization, whose plethoric purse could be relied upon to keep it alive; but it had that indispensable element of every good journal, an Editor, who, like Horace Greeley, thoroughly believed that he had a mission to perform, and that there was on this continent a vast number who were ready to hear the good news, which it was his earnest desire to convey. D. M. Bennett, like Horace Greeley, never has time to court his graces before the looking-glass, or see that the legs of his pantaloons are smoothly stretched on the outside of his boots.

Like Horace Greeley, too, he works eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. The former punctured every corruption in the state; Bennett punctures every corruption in both Church and State. His "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," shows that even heaven itself is not exempt from the assaults of this implacable enemy of superstition; and yet, like Horace Greeley, he has a mild, kindly face, with a broad, open forehead; he looks at you with a pleasant smile through a pair of blue eyes, the wrinkles at the corners of which indicate a rather mirthful disposition. When in repose, you can hardly realize that this is the man who edits THE TRUTH SEEKER, but speak of some act of ecclesiastical tyranny or social corruption; and the lips suddenly contract and the eyes flash with indignation. In a moment the mild Melancthon becomes the implacable image-breaker, like John Knox, who cried: "Tear down the nests (cathedrals), and the foul birds (the priests) will flee away." Bennett denounces these foul birds in language equally vigorous (See THE TRUTH SEEKER, Nov. 15th. "The Christian religion costs this country $200,000,000 annually, and the question naturally arises, are the returns in proportion to the cost? Truth answers, no, no, no.")

Knox denounced the Romish Church; Bennett denounces the entire Christian Church, Protestant as well as Catholic, and every form of superstition. He is not only an unwearied worker, but he has a happy faculty of making and retaining friends. His sanctum is now visited by Freethinkers from every State in the Union. When they call, he will drop his pen and gather up all the items of news, and in the best-natured manner, enter in conversation with his guests, who invariably leave the sanctum in a happy and hopeful frame of mind; happy because they have met a brother who is perfectly natural, thoroughly Radical, and as free to speak as he is to think; hopeful, because he feels a fresh assurance that superstition will be dethroned and NATURAL TRUTH enthroned in the human mind, in proof of which, this man whom they have just left has invested in the conflict his entire capital, his whole time, and all the energy and enthusiasm of his soul. Perhaps they do not know that to make up for the time spent so pleasantly with him, the Editor must burn the "midnight oil."

A Western miller once said: "My mill never knows when Sunday comes," so the water fell on the wheel. So with Bennett's pen, the ink flows just as freely on Sunday, and his thoughts more smoothly, on that day, because he has fewer visitors, and because he believes that the necessity for labor is not a curse but a blessing. All toil, either of hand or brain, (when the object is to remove what obstructs or increases the means of human happiness,) is holy. His Sunday is made sacred by unremitting toil.

I have often told him that, like most brain-workers, the strain upon him would ultimately result in a sudden collapse. He would reply: "I prefer to die in the harness. I am healthy, because I am sober and temperate. I love to work, because I love the work and feel able to do it. I sleep sound because I have a clear conscience. My mind is often uneasy because a newspaper cannot live without money, and my subscriptions often come in so slowly that I nearly lose heart. My philosophy has lifted me above the fear of death for myself, but I have no philosophy that would enable me to contemplate the death of THE TRUTH SEEKER, without a sense of sorrow. Even were I to die myself, I would, at the last moment, look to my successor, and cry out, 'hold the fort.'"

"But," said I, "while you are doing the work of four men, and have to pay bills for paper, printing, stamps, rent and light, which must all be cash in advance, your subscribers read the paper with pleasure, but forget that the time paid for, has long since expired, and one or two thousand such have forgotten to send the necessary two dollars. What is it that makes you cling to the oar like a galley slave, and struggle so hard to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER afloat, like a heroic color-bearer amid the roar of battle?"

"Ah!" said he, "just at the moment when I am most despondent, the letter-carrier will hand me a lot of letters, some of which are reminders that an account will be due on a certain day, but one will read like this: 'Dear Bennett: Enclosed find a draft for fourteen dollars, to pay the subscription of myself and the following five persons . . . and the other two dollars is a present to yourself, and to let you know that we do not forget you.' See, such a letter lifts me right up. I grasp my pen with a firm hand; I work with fresh zeal; my faith in the cause rises because I have proof that I am not alone nor forgotten."

Now, at this point, let me state, that many years ago I became a reader of the Investigator, and although its high price prevented its becoming a popular paper, yet so anxious was I to see the cause of mental freedom extended, that on the first day of every year and on other occasions, I would think over all my friends who would be likely to appreciate the paper, among whom I would select from four to twelve, to whom I could send the paper free; some for six months, some for one year, for which I paid the editor.

In this way I could help the cause of Freethought, for to me intellectual freedom was a religion, and I well knew that the American Tract and Bible Societies were expending millions to teach the danger of trusting to reason as a guide, and were blocking up the pathway of science at every step, by teaching that our business on earth was not to be happy here, but rather to be miserable in order to be happy hereafter. That as for our sake Christ had been very unhappy in this world; so for his sake we ought to be very unhappy also, that in the world to come we might have a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." The thinker and the man of science speak a far different language to the weary, foot-sore savage, who alternately scourges himself and his fetish. They say: "Come into this railroad carriage and ride," or "let me send your message by lightning;" "here take this cotton, or woolen, or silken fabric and cover your naked body;" "this earth is your home and that of your race, adorn it, improve yourself and be happy;" "birds nests do not grow on trees, they are built there. Houses do not come out of the earth like vegetables, nor do they spring up in answer to prayer, unless by prayer we mean conception, perception and construction."

A newspaper, like a house, is an offspring of the human brain, we love the latter when it becomes our home; in a higher sense we love a newspaper, because it is our home, too. Here we meet our friends, here our choicest thoughts find an abiding place; here we either see our thoughts expressed or reflected.

Now let me suggest that the best way for every earnest reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to help it, and the cause it represents, is to invest $5 or $10 according to ability, and then select names to whom you will send the paper until the sum sent is expended. In the meantime get all that you can to pay for it themselves.

Last winter I had occasion to go out West, on some business, and I picked up fifty-three subscribers for the TRUTH SEEKER, only five of which I paid for myself and one of these was a clergyman of very Liberal views.

To illustrate how easily this is done—I enter the cars at an Iowa station, I look around for a seat with one occupant, I generally select one who is well-developed in the upper forehead; in almost every case I find that he is either a very advanced Christian, of the Congregational, Universalist or Unitarian type, or an out-and-out Freethinker. I take out my TRUTH SEEKER and begin to look over its pages. My companion has also a paper; we finish about the same time; I take his Chicago Times, he takes my TRUTH SEEKER. He looks over the first page; by-and-by he breaks out with:

"Tough on Beecher."

"Yes, rather too tough on him," I reply.

"Not a bit! The priesthood are a tough lot. They used to say, 'The king can do no wrong,' and some think so of the priests now. But they are highly fed and the gospel is a very light load for an ordinary brain, so that their animal spirits overflow in love to other men's wives. Look at Glendenning, hanging is too good for him; and he is a fair sample of the whole lot."

"Can't they be reformed? I say let them study and teach science that would occupy their time."

"Let them, of course we will let them, but they won't, they're a bad lot, sir! Clean them out I say, and give their room to better men. I want a copy of this paper, Sir." And he pays me for three months. The man behind us hears our remarks.

"Is that a square up and down Infidel paper, Sir?"

"Yes, as square as a brick."

"Then let me have fifty cents worth, too."

Another gentleman, a Mr. Cleveland, came forward and stated that he was a Spiritualist, and an unbeliever in old orthodoxy.

"How is this editor on Spiritual philosophy?"

"Oh," I replied, "the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER accepts a portion of the Spiritualistic phenomena, but has never been a medium, and has never relied upon any revelation from the other world, any more than myself, I think; but his paper, like the Investigator, has been, and is, open to a fair discussion of that subject, for like you, Sir, nearly all modern Spiritualists are also Rationalists, and ought to be heard in a Liberal paper."

"All right, send me one copy to Aaron S. Cleveland, of Volga City, Iowa."

Thus, before I left that car, I had six subscribers, and I had the supreme satisfaction of knowing that in the West, at least, we were a very respectable minority, and were rapidly on the increase.

Before I left this train I had another little bit of romance which I think too good to omit. I was somewhat tired of talking, and had subsided into a quiet corner in another car, and was reading a copy of David Swing's book, when a gentleman stepped up to me and said, "Sir, are you a clergyman?"

"No," I answered. "Did you suppose that I was?"

"No, not I, sir; but my wife has bet a dollar that you are a clergyman, I have bet a dollar that you are an out and out Infidel."

I replied, with a good-natured smile, "I am sorry your lady should lose her money on my account; but I do not think you have fairly won it, for I am neither a clergyman nor an Infidel; for though I am not a clergyman, in the popular sense, yet I both teach and preach the religion of Humanity, and I am an Infidel as commonly understood, that is, I reject whatever is incompatible with reason. As I owe allegiance to reason, as the highest authority, and the court of last appeal, therefore I am not an Infidel."

This gentleman, who is now a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a resident of Postville, Iowa, will remember this little episode, and will, I hope, remember what I said, that as the wife had lost her bet, it could be no loss to her, since what she had lost, he had won. But the best thing was that I got a new subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Now, in closing, let me say, that we must rally around THE TRUTH SEEKER, one and all, male and female.

Look at its contributors. B. F. UNDERWOOD with his calm, rational and progressive logic.

Mr. M. STEIN with his clear and practical common sense views of political and social life. Where he advises the settlement of all disputes in a court of arbitration instead of a law court, where the jury is usually composed of loafers and political hangers-on of the party whom popular ignorance usually floats to the surface. Also, ELMINA D. SLECKER and SUSAN H. WIXON, whose stories possess that indescribable charm peculiar to ladies who are independent thinkers, but especially to those ladies of the Quaker type who as Michelet says, "are an unfathomable mystery, always breaking out where you least expect them to."

Then JOHN SYMPERS, who when he says a serious thing we suspect a concealed joke, and we begin to laugh whether we will or not.

Then HUGH BYRON BROWN, with his deep, earnest nature, who sees in all the past, in its successive degrees, only so many steps in an endless ladder whose name is PROGRESS, and whose ultimate aim is happiness or heaven for all mankind. And above all stands the short letters in the "Friendly Correspondence" which are a kind of "camp-meeting" experience of each individual from Maine to California. They are short, pithy and pointed. I like to read them, and I hope they will remain a leading feature of our paper.

I became, Mr. Editor, more attached to your paper every year, because I see in it signs of progress; that it will become the organ, or exponent of those social reforms which will most effectually help to establish a better religion, with science as its support, a religion which will endorse the family, resting upon the pure love of one pair, and that pair will assume the sacred duty of raising up children, to live a moral, a virtuous and a rational life, which must also be a life of labor in some useful industry or noble profession; and also to know that its life must, in order to be immortal, be taken up into the succeeding life, and thus through humanity, live for ever. When that time comes, the barbarous notion that the body has a resting place, which can be marked by a tombstone, will disappear, and the "s.m. picture" will become the true and economical medium of embalming the memory of those we love, and of those who have deserved our love.

Your paper, Sir, is the only Rationalistic paper in this great metropolis, and as soon as it can announce a body of doctrine around which we can unite, not only to free ourselves from past error, but to declare for the high st known truth, that which we can throw as a mantle around the child, that upon which the young man and woman may rely, when assailed by passion, from within and temptation from without, as well as that will cheer us in the decline of life, and enable us to meet death without fear, and free assured that, though objectively we have passed away, yet subjectively we shall live forever and ever.

First. Mr. Editor, make your paper catholic in its spirit.

Second. Sell it as low as you can, in price.

Third. Publish all the short letters; they are thoughts in stand, and statue is a body transformed into rock.

And, my friends—the readers—let me say:

1. Support the paper yourself, and pay for it.

2. Induce others to take it and read it. If they will not, send it to them; this will make it catholic.

3. Write to it, and let us look at each other's souls, rational, honest, pure and free. Let us tell our experience, so that we may write our own epitaphs while living, and save that trouble and expense to our friends.

And, Mr. Editor, if Jesus Christ does not take any notice of your "Open Letter," (and I don't think he will any more than Tyndall, Huxley, Peter Cooper or Moody and Sankey, is likely to, with our friend, Joseph Treat's,) then I suggest that we fill the paper up with short and friendly ones from living saints; for if Jesus should actually send you a real letter with an old-fashioned red seal stamped with a head of the Holy Ghost on the wax, how could you ever satisfy Syphers that Talmage, or Moody, or Beecher had not written it, and signed Christ's name to it, for they all claim to be his mediums, and declare that Christ and the Holy Ghost are at every meeting, anywhere they may see fit to call them, down or up as the case may be?

No! no! Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Christ, Shakespeare, Milton, Descartes, Spinoza, Franklin and Lincoln have had their day, and will never write any more letters to anybody, "open" or shut. It is our turn to write letters, edit papers, pay for them, make saints and holy virgins—and every mother is one—improved, and her son is one of the Godhead, and must be crucified in death, each for himself, and rise again from the dead, as nobody ever did, except through the never-ending life of our race, to whom be all honor and glory, now and for evermore. Amen.

Missionaries.

Our little village has lately been visited by a man who has a son who has been a missionary in China for a great many years. The old man delivered some lectures on the progress of missionary labors in China, and exhibited many curiosities brought from there, and among the rest two stone gods or idols—ugly little images about a foot in height. He also had paintings of several other of their gods, all of which he showed to the assembled crowd, and then made fun of and ridiculed a people who could worship such senseless images for thousands and thousands of years; and contrasted these little powerless gods with "our" great, omnipotent, all-wise, "good God," telling us how thankful we should be that our lot was cast in a Christian land, where we were watched over and cared for by a real, prayer-hearing, prayer-answering God. He wondered how the "heathen Chinese" could have any faith in their gods, when they saw that in all the years in which they had been praying to them not one prayer had ever been heard or answered!

Thinks I to myself, "what prayer has your big, imaginary ideal God ever heard or specially answered during the many centuries you have been so zealously praising, eulogizing and beseeching him? I'll wager "a pretty" with any one, that he may offer up ten prayers to his God, and I'll offer the same ten to a stone image, and my prayer will be as often answered as his will, notwithstanding my ungodliness and want of faith.

He said that all the religions of the Chinese were mythological (strongly emphasizing the myth) and false throughout, and that they were all the time arguing and disputing among themselves concerning it, one believing this and another that, some not believing in any of them.

And is it not just the same here in Christian lands? only still more so, because superior education, culture and refinement have elevated the Christian further above his religion than it has the heathen above his. The more people get to understand true science, philosophy and fact, the less faith they will have in all myths and ologies whatsoever, and consequently the more will they differ about them. He showed the picture of a Chinese magician who cast out devils, telling the story of the woman who was ill, and this man cast a devil out of her, put it in a bowl, covered it up, took it out and buried it in the ground—the woman getting well after this performance; and then reminded us, as was his fashion after each hit at heathenism, that there was no authority for these things in "our" Bible, pointing each time to the holy (?) book at his side.

Doubtless he forgot that, in that very Bible that casting out of devils was a common occurrence, and that Christ himself cast a whole legion of them out of a man, allowing them to enter a herd of 2,000 swine, which ran violently down into the lake and were choked to death, while the men who fed them hastened to the city to tell the tale. The multitude on hearing it, besought Jesus to depart, for they feared for the safety of the remainder of their flocks and herds should such a non-respecter of private property longer remain with them.

Now this devilish tale is much more reprehensible than that of the poor Chinese, who quietly put his devil in a bowl and then buried it, but it is to be presumed that Jesus thought it by far too great a task to bury two thousand devils, and as the swine were not his property, he sacrificed them rather than soil his delicate hands by manual labor. It is much easier for some people to get a living with their tongues than with their hands, and from all accounts this Emanuel, this Christ Jesus, was one of the talkers, going about helping himself from other people's corn-fields, stables, etc., whenever he was hungry or wished for a ride.

The lecturer also spoke of Spiritualism and the great evil it had done, again remarking, that we had no authority for such things in "this book;" and O! I did wish to whisper in his ear, and in those of every one there present, the story of Saul and the Witch of Endor, asking them if THAT was not calling up spirits!

Then he went on to tell of the great good that had been done by the missionaries in China and other heathen lands, and how eager the heathen were to read of Jesus, and what a wonderful power of conversion there was in the words of the holy Bible when it was read by a heathen; and as he talked, I was all the time thinking of the Sandwich Islands, which are considered to be the most converted of all heathen countries, and yet what has actually been accomplished. Read the news that now comes from there. They are fast being depopulated. The native inhabitants are growing idle, vicious and lazy. The white residents are leaving the country because business is dull, and the past season has been so inconceivably hot and money has been so scarce. They have sucked the orange dry, got all they could out of the "poor heathen," bought up and obtained possession of the land and turned it into sugar plantations, and forced the natives to do all the labor for them at starvation prices or be imprisoned.

Only one hundred years ago they were a happy, healthy and comparatively wealthy people, numbering 500,000 individuals, and now they are only 35,000 and are growing poorer and poorer year after year, "while a blight seems to be over everything." Now had a few really disinterested, benevolent philosophers went among them teaching them morality, science, arts and industries, instead of preaching Christ and him crucified, and pointing to a Biblical record of wars, murders, rapines and religious bigotry and persecution as a guide to all goodness, how different would have been the result, and how immeasurably less the outlay and expense. Christians go among the heathen exaggerating enormously the few local errors, misdeeds and ignorance which they find there, and generally introduce half a dozen new crimes or vices for every old one they eradicate.

I read not long ago of a missionary lady in Japan who was watching a group of the native children play "blind man's buff," and said she, "O how heartily they did play, with all their might and main! Yet I have never seen them quarrel or fight; and if one should chance to fall, all are anxious to help him or her up, and wipe the face and dust the clothes, and all so kindly that it is very pretty to see. But, alas, this is not all that must be said of these very interesting children. If you would go with me to one of the many temples, you would see these little ones come with their mothers, clasp their little hands and bow their heads in honor, not of our Father in heaven, but of some false god, they know not whom."

And is it not far better to worship a God that makes them innocent, peaceable and happy, than one who is angry, jealous and revengeful? What we worship, that we tend to copy, and if we worship the God of Moses, we shall tend to be like him in character. Just so long as missionaries go about preaching up the God of the old Jew book, just so long will their teaching do more harm than good. Not until scientists and philosophers, Infidels and Atheists take the missionary cause in their own hands, and go among the barbarous and uncivilized nations, teaching them morality without religion, science without religion, arts and manufacture without religion, and social economy without religion, the missionary cause is one of almost unmitigated evil to the world.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va., Oct. 11th, 1875.

The Genii of the Period.

Passing reverently by the first chapter of Genesis, taking man as we find him within the ken of reliable history, we make the sublime discovery that very important changes have come over him. When, a few moons ago,

"Nothing dwelt but beasts of prey,

And men as fierce and wild as they,"

We now have the happiness to find a measure of civilization and refinement—the alpha of an interminable series of advance movements, which may, in some vast future, culminate in an approach to the likeness of God.

If there be a Power, unseeable by the unpracticed eye; an Intelligence, that overrules in the affairs of men; a Wisdom, surpassing the congregated wisdom of our most enlightened nations, is it quite reasonable to suppose that, through all stages of progress, humanity is under the same tutelage?

Reasoning from analogy, do we not reach the conclusion, that to every advance movement there is a change of Genii, adapted to the services to be performed?

Compared with the Genii who presided over humanity in its inception, are not the Genii of the better classes of this enlightened age, ladies and gentlemen in the better acceptance?

If different classes of Genii preside over humanity in different historic periods, why may not different tutelars preside over different classes of minds, in accordance with advancement, in the same period? And, as this little Universe is being constructed upon the variety in harmony idea—the individuality idea—why may not each individual have a guardian spirit?

In life's journey questions arise in which earnest minds are at a loss which way the balance beam ought to tip, and as it is fairly presumable that the guardian is, to some extent, the superior of the ward, in the wisdom which experience gives, is it not well so to hold ourselves in receptive condition, as to hear and understand what the guardian suggests? We say suggests, for no spirit in harmony with the sublime center of goodness, will ever trench upon the freedom of the will.

And right here, I am minded of a little historic episode, in my long-time-ago acquaintance with the red man of the then far West—no far West now.

Near the foot of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, "Indian go hunting." When he come home, children say, "Pale-face come and drive off our cattle." Indian say nothing. Children say, "What you do—kill pale-face?" Indian say, "No; Great Spirit no be pleased with me if I kill pale-face." Children say, "Have pale-face no Great Spirit?" Indian say, "Yes." Children say, "Is Great Spirit pleased with pale-face, when he drive off our cattle?" Indian say, "Great Spirit speak only to the inward ear, pale-face so busy here and there and all about, he no hold still long enough to hear with the inward ear, so he no hear what Great Spirit say." PRENTISS.

A Marvelous Manifestation.

(From a Terre Haute paper.)

Terre Haute, Nov. 6, 1875.—We, the managers of Mrs. Stewart's seances, have known for some time past that through her mediumship, spirits materialize and present their friends in mortal, beautiful and fragrant flowers, fresh from the parent stem with the dew drop glistening upon the petals; and in return the bouquets presented to them by earthly friends, are readily de-materialized and spirited away by some mysterious and invisible process unknown to us. This to us was wonderful, but far, far more wonderful were the demonstrations of last evening (Nov. 5). The manifestations at this seance, for a time, were of the usual order; thus, spirit friends, one after the other, each in his or her own order, old and young, appeared upon the rostrum, and each in turn, after shaking the hand of some recognized friend or friends, exchanging a few words of friendly greeting, closing with a smile and God bless you, gave way for others. Finally, Charles Smith, chief of the spirit band, appeared, who, after shaking hands with several friends, concluding with remarks in a general way, returned to the cabinet, and after opening the doors that all might see the medium, who was occupying her chair in an unconscious trance, as was the custom of those who preceded him, the doors were closed, and we were requested to remain quiet, explaining that they intended an experiment. Naught but the steady tinkling of the music-box was heard; all else was as still as the grave; five minutes passed; the door-bolt was sprung, doors thrown open, and lo! the medium's chair was vacant, not a vestige of her to be seen. Charles Smith, leaving the doors open that all might be convinced that she was not visibly present, advanced to the front of the rostrum, bringing the empty chair with him; returning, closed the doors, and requested that the music-box be kept continuously running, as they intended to recall the medium. Five minutes passed in silence, and it was announced that the medium was restored, and the most astonishing seance ever witnessed by us closed. The medium came out in an exhausted condition, from which she rapidly recovered.

In conclusion, we fearlessly assert, first, that Smith and Stewart are distinct individualities, therefore, Smith could not have been Mrs. Stewart in disguise; second, it was impossible for her to remain in any part of the cabinet unobserved; and third, she could not by any possibility pass from and return to the cabinet in her normal condition, and not be detected. The phenomena, to us, are inexplicable and incomprehensible; the facts we record, leaving the solution for others.

[We are personally acquainted with the first two signers to the above statement, and know them to be honorable, reliable and truthful gentlemen.—ED. T. S.]

An Indiana man said to a Bible agent: "I'm a Christian, but I'll be blamed if I don't have to grit my teeth when the Ohio river is on a level with the top of my corn."

turc age, that however black their crimes, however base their sins, however dishonest or iniquitous their conduct may be, that it can all be blotted out; that their record can be made spotless and clean; that their sins, though as red as scarlet, can be made as white as wool; that they can be washed in the blood of an innocent lamb and be rendered immaculate, pure and spotless; that however great the score of indebtedness that may be posted up against them in the great ledger, that a kind-hearted individual will settle it all, if they will simply believe in him—that "Jesus pays it all"?

There can be no doubt that the sentiments and morals taught to children and youth, have a great influence in forming character and in establishing a rule by which to square the conduct of life. It is undeniable that the religious belief of a people has much to do in controlling their actions and in establishing their character and habits. Can it be expected that a nation can ever be honest, moral and truthful, when they are instructed from infancy, that in securing happiness, that in laying up treasures in heaven, morality and good actions count as nothing; that in fact they are often a hindrance to happiness, and that however great an amount of moral and spiritual indebtedness a person may pile up, Jesus stands ready and willing to pay the entire score.

This system of religion, this plan of salvation, is well calculated for moral bankrupts and those who want to eat well, and dress well, at somebody else's expense and upon the result of the labors of others. This getting to heaven by taking the benefit of the bankrupt act, inevitably makes moral delinquents and dishonest individuals of most of those who embrace the doctrine.

It is a far better religion, far more moral and more truthful, to inculcate into the minds of the young, and people of all ages, the great moral maxims that our happiness and peace of mind depend upon our conduct; that justification, like happiness, cannot be bought nor borrowed, nor stolen; that neither the blood of a lamb nor a belief in any blood, can avail in washing away the effects of wrong doing; that every act committed, whether good or bad, either adds to, or diminishes our happiness and peace of mind; that every individual is responsible for his own conduct; that the virtues, good deeds and good qualities of one person, cannot be transmitted to another; that the effects of a crime or a wrong action, can no more be removed by forgiveness, than can the effects of a burn, a broken limb or a dose of poison; that the better way to avoid the effects of misdeeds, is not to commit them; and that the safest plan to secure a competence, or to ensure peace of mind and happiness, is to work industriously, live honestly, and to do wrong to no man.

The gods have little use for our services, our devotions, our adulations or our praises. They are so far removed from us, they are so uncertain a quantity that it is not in our power to aid them nor to injure them. It is within our power to aid or injure ourselves and our fellow-beings around us. In view of these impregnable truths, should the actions of man be governed?

Common honesty is far too rare a commodity in this advanced nineteenth century. The great bulk of the community are trying to gain an advantage over their neighbors, and so far as in their power to get something for nothing. The actions of men are far too much influenced by selfish motives, and there is not regard enough felt for the happiness and welfare of neighbors, friends and strangers.

If we will do away with all dishonest gods, all unjust devils, all false systems of theology, and all blind and erroneous creeds; if we will square our daily actions by the principles of honor, honesty and uprightness; if we will make it a point to see how much we can add to the happiness of those around us; if we will resolve to dispense with all silly gew-gaws, all the trappings of vanity; if we will strive for the beautiful and the useful; if we will be content with a moderate amount of wealth; if we will be willing to dispense with luxuries; if we will at all times realize the truth that our own happiness is increased by adding to the happiness of others, we will do very much towards making this a brighter, an honest and a happier world, and will need no blood of a god, nor a son of a god, to make us happy now, or in the future.

Let us cherish the good qualities of our natures and check and curb those of an opposite character. There is scarcely a human being—however low and depraved—but what has many good qualities in his organization. It should be the duty of his life to cultivate and increase the good, and root out and lessen the opposite.

The finest fruits, the choicest grains, the most beautiful flowers, do not grow spontaneously on every hand, but have to be cultivated with care. The weeds, the thistles, the nettles, and the poisonous plants, have to be uprooted and removed. So it is with personal qualities and individual characteristics. Some are less useful and less to be admired than others. One class needs culture and care, the other should be destroyed. Let us apply the same tactics and practices in one field that we do in another, and we can succeed in making this world about as pleasant and happy as we wish. We will not need to wait till we die before we go to heaven, for we can get up one here, on our own account, and if there is a continued existence after this life, we will be far better prepared for it than by neglecting our own faults and depending upon the virtues of another.

If every man will make himself honest, we will soon have an honest community. If we will search diligently and select honest men, only, to fill public offices and to be law-makers; if we will co-operate together in insisting upon such reforms as our country requires; if we will firmly resolve to have fewer officers, and to pay them less exorbitant salaries; if crime and dishonesty can be more effectually punished; if we will attach to wealth and its acquisition no value any farther than that it secures to us the comforts of life and the absence of suffering and want; if we render it impossible for any individual to accumulate, by fraud, dishonesty or otherwise, an undue portion of wealth, whether in money or land; if we will make the rich pay the burdens of the government; if labor can be provided for all: if none are suffered to be idle and non-producers; we may have a country flourishing in comfort, prosperity and happiness.

We gratefully acknowledge from Brother W. F. JAMIESON the receipt of a fine copy of his work, "The Clergy a Source of Danger," "Was Jesus Christ a Democrat," a reply to Prof. S. B. Brittan, "Origin and Progress of the Movement for the Recognition of the Christian God, Jesus Christ and the Bible in the United States' Constitution," and "Ought Christians to Debate." The first is an elaborate, able and exhaustive work, which has been some time before the public. The other three are pamphlets. Mr. Jamieson is an able writer and a popular lecturer. He is now in the lecture field in the West, and may, during December, be addressed at Quincy, Ill. The title of one of his lectures is, "Value of Wit, Ridicule, and Laughter;" doubtless an interesting one.

A Card.

MR. EDITOR: A sense of decent respect does not permit me to reply in kind to the column of falsehoods insinuated in the last number of your paper by that man Butts. My character and standing in this city require no vindication, but the many friends who deal with me through the country may want to have me stamp his misrepresentations as they deserve, for which reason I take the trouble of asking you to give your opinion of this man's insinuations (for he has not the courage to make a clear, positive statement) to the readers of your paper. They, doubtless, read sufficiently clear, positive statements over the signatures of a number of very prominent gentlemen a couple of years ago, to fully appreciate his character.

Yours truly,

MORRIS ALTMAN.

P. S.—Whenever my statements with reference to the Paine Hall matter are denied by Messrs. Mendum, Seaver or Savage, (which they have not yet done,) I will reply to them, but to no hireling drummer or outsider.

M. A.

We regret that the unkind personal allusions mentioned above, should have appeared in our last. We did not approve of their nature or animus, and protested against their admission. A disposition to let both sides be heard, and especially an unwillingness to deny our Boston friends, or their representative, a place in our columns to defend themselves, was what induced us, against our better judgment, to give insertion to the objectionable parts of the article alluded to, though we could not see what connection it had with Paine Hall, or what additional light it threw upon the matter. What has appeared in our columns upon that unfortunate subject, we have published from a sense of duty, believing the Liberal public were entitled to the facts in the case. We are sure we feel no ill-will to any of the parties concerned, and are inclined to believe that the errors that have been made, were errors of judgment rather than the promptings of dishonesty. We hope, in this connection, that no friend will ask us again to publish unkind and unfair personal allusions that have no bearing upon the subject.

We regret, exceedingly, if in what we have thus done, the slightest injury should inure to friend Altman. He is a warm, generous friend of the Liberal cause; the cheerful acknowledgment of his generous donations to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to aid in spreading Radical, Freethought sentiments, have appeared in our columns. We regard him as one of the warmest friends of which THE TRUTH SEEKER proudly boasts. He has been forward in many Liberal movements, and stands ready, to-day, to aid any worthy Radical work that may need his aid. He commands the respect and confidence of a numerous circle of friends and acquaintances. He is one of the leading dry goods merchants of the city; his credit and reputation stand "A No. 1." His business is rapidly increasing. We have reason to know that many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have made many purchases of him, and we believe with entire satisfaction. We have read very complimentary letters from those who have purchased of him, expressing the highest satisfaction with the quality of goods and the lowness of price.

His donations to "Paine Hall" were quite heavy. He now holds in his safe a will, bequeathing $13,000 to the Paine Hall Fund, upon certain conditions, which he is waiting to have complied with by the Boston parties. We cheerfully add, that we have the fullest confidence in Mr. Altman's integrity and his devotion to the Liberal cause.

This we say, without wishing in the slightest degree to disparage the efforts Mr. Butts has made to spread Freethought and Liberal sentiments over the country, and we sympathize with him that he did not find it more remunerative.

Friends, all a fraternal feeling of accord and harmony is our great dependence in the affairs of life. Let us not lose sight of this.—ED. TRUTH SEEKER.

Short Sermon No. 2.

BY REV. THEOLOGICUS D. D.

A Sign Worthy of a God.

MR. EDITOR: I see that some of your contributors are still far from being orthodox, and I feel it high time that I preach them another short sermon, in which I shall try to reconcile what is irreconcilable in the infallible word of God.

The reader will please mark well the sacred text, Mark viii. 12: "And he sighed deeply in spirit, and saith why doeth this generation seek after a sign? Verily I say unto you, there shall no sign be given to this generation." Math. xii. 38-40: There shall no sign be given to it but the sign of the prophet Jonas: For, as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. Luke, xi. 28-30: "There shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet; for as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall the Son of Man be unto this generation." Mark, xvi. 17-18: "And these signs shall follow them that believe; In my name shall they cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and they shall drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them, they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

John xx. 20: "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples." Acts v. 15: And by the hand of the apostles were many signs wrought among the people.

First. What is a sign? Second. No sign. Third. One sign. Fourth. Another sign. Fifth. Many other signs.

1st. What is a sign?

There are tavern signs, cross-road signs, store signs, office signs, and signs of office. There are title signs, signs like Rev., D. D., L.L.D., Dr., etc. Signs of rain, signs of the sky, signs of the moon, signs of the zodiac, signs of wealth, signs of poverty, signs of health, signs of debauchery, signs of love, signs of hate, signs of war, signs of peace, signs of a prophet, signs of a god; no sign, one sign, another sign, and many other signs.

2nd. No sign.—It is claimed for Jesus that he was God, and further, (in his diabolical mood,) the Scriptures show him to have been one with Satan. Isa. xiv. 12: Satan is spoken of thus; "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! Lucifer, if translated into English, is, literally Morning Star."

Rev. xxii. 11, Jesus says of himself, "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." This is proof point blank. But if your deluded readers need further proof, I refer them to the following inspired passage, which they can look up and read at their leisure. 2nd Cor., xi. 14; Rev., ii. 58: 2nd Peter, i. 19.

As I set forth in my first sermon, God, and the devil are both one, and it is all in the mood whether he is the one or the other.

As for the masses, they considered Jesus but a man. But as Jesus and his adherents claimed that he was more, the people clamored for a sign, as proof of his pretensions. But instead of giving one he flew into the diabolical mood, and called them a generation of vipers, snakes, toads, scorpions, and lizards, "a wicked and adulterous generation, seeking after a sign." But, he declares with a verity no sign shall be given this generation. Yea, he sighed deeply in spirit, showing that the incarnated devil, (remember he was in the diabolical mood,) within him was aroused, and that which he said, he meant. It was as if he had said, "I will not work a miracle, I will neither cast out a devil, cure the sick, open the eyes of the blind, unstop the ears of the deaf, cause the lame to walk, unloose the tongues of the dumb, or raise the dead." And furthermore, none of my disciples, or any one else, shall do the like, during the lifetime of this generation, for mark you, "no sign shall be given this generation." Of course he lied like the devil, that he was, (remember the mood,) for that, see Mark, Luke, and John, four infallible witnesses testify to his working many signs, also, that they did the same.

Third. One sign, Matthew comes to the help of these poor, bedeviled Jews, and tells them that they should have one sign, but "nary another." But it was to be accomplished by the head of the firm of Father, Son & Ghost, and the Son of man was to be the subject of the sign by which his deific character was to be proven. Think you, the sign of Jonas; yea, and more than the sign of Jonas, for "a greater than Jonas was there."

We are informed that Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly in the bottom of the sea. He thought it pretty rough, but still Jonah was in rather snug quarters, with his head wrapped up in sea weeds. 'Tis true, he was pretty well soaked with bile, which made his lot rather bitter. But he might have stood it a few days longer if God had not given the whale an emeti, and sculled him ashore, and caused him to throw Jonah out upon dry land. But the thing as it was, was a very good sign for a lesser prophet. It would have done well for a bigger prophet, and it might have been made to answer for a second or third-rate God. The sign of Jonah but faintly portrays the sign of the Son of man. This sign of the Son of man, was a sign of the first water, real baptism by fire, a sign worthy of a first-class God. O, my hearers, look at it, as I but faintly draw the picture.

Only think of it, "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." The heart of the earth! what is it? The heart of a tree is its center; the heart of every fruit is its center; the heart of every sphere is its center; the heart of the earth is its center, more than four thousand miles from its surface. Now science teaches us that, according to the ratio of increasing heat as we descend toward the center, would bring us to a molten mass of mineral substances in less than fifty miles from the surface. Yes, a veritable bottomless pit of liquid fire; and to the very center of this molten mass was the Son of man to penetrate and remain three days and three nights as a sign of his Deityship. Now, mark you, he was to go body, soul and all, as Jonah went into the whale. O, my God! only think of it! First, he must penetrate fifty miles of crust, earth and rock, the last half of the way at a red or white heat, that would have broiled a common man to a crisp in one minute. Methinks even John Syphers would have longed for the shady side of a "God-house" on the surface before he had got half way through this crust.

The sacred historian has not told us how the "Son of Man" got through this crust. There may be some royal road to hell over which he traveled, that has never yet been discovered, and probably will not be till the "Son of Man" comes again and brings the keys of hell (see Prov. i. 18), and unlocks the secret trap, and with a whip of scorpions drives into it "the wicked and all the nations that forget God."

Yes, my friends, this nation must hurry up and get the firm of Father, Son & Ghost into the constitution, or every mother's son and daughter of us will soon be through the trap, for science and Scripture both inform us that "fiery billows roll beneath our feet." But I have digressed—let me see, where am I? O, yes, I have just got the Son of Man through the crust. Now comes the tug of war. He must travel four thousand miles through this fiery mass to the heart of the earth. And here we are at a loss again, as the sacred historian does not tell us by what force he was sent on his journey through the fiery element. For as molten mineral substance is many times more dense than the human body, it would take an omnipotent force to direct him through.

But a second thought, my hearers, I remember he bore with him the original sin of the whole world, which sin so saturated and filled up every pore of his body, as to make it a thousand times more dense than the combined density of all metals. If so, (and I think I am correct in this matter,) then he went to the center of hell fire it has no bottom, as the plummet descends to the bottom of the sea. Contemplate it, who can. For seventy-two hours he stands the fiery ordeal, four thousand miles from a breath of air, till original sin was burnt out of him, which left him as light and as porous as a cork, when, with lightning speed, he shoots, rocket-like, toward the surface. O, should he miss the trap-door but a single foot in his upward flight, he would be mashed to a jelly, and the whole world's prospect for salvation knocked into pi. But banish your fears, ye timid ones, for the Father was at the helm, and he knew mighty well that he wouldn't miss "hell-gate," but come out all right. And he did! My friends, he did! and now stands at, or sits (I don't know which), on the right of the throne of God in heaven, where you can see him any day you have a mind to go there.

Jonah thought he was in hell, for he says: "Out of the belly of hell cried I;" but bless you, he hadn't got even a fair start toward it, he did not go only to the bottom of the sea which was not more than five miles at most. And then there was a whole sea of water around him to cool his tongue had it been parched. But had he traveled the road over which the Son of Man went, with all his pluck, he would have been burned to a cinder, and given up the ghost before he had gone a thousand miles. But I must not enlarge, but hasten to consider Fourthly, Another Sign.

Luke informs us that as "Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites, so should the Son of Man be to that generation." First, let us consider what kind of a sign Jonah was to the Ninevites. Most theologians suppose that as Jonah was swallowed by the whale, with results as aforesaid, it was a sign to the Ninevites that God sent him to warn them of the coming destruction of their city. But I beg leave to differ from most of my brethren in the ministry on this point. For what could the Ninevites know about the whale swallowing Jonah, when at the nearest point it was 250 miles from the sea? they could only have had Jonah's word for it, and they were such wicked cusses they would not have believed him, and we have no evidence that he said a word to them more than his message, which was: "Yet forty days and God will destroy this city." But, my friends, had Jonah done the swallowing, and swam ashore, traveled 250 miles or more to Nineveh, and in the midst of the principal street, in front of the Grand Hotel or Post Office, at mid-day standing before the crowd, "being too full for utterance," disgorged a whale of forty or fifty tons weight, then would the Ninevites have had a first-class sign. But, as it stands, the city was not overthrown, which was a sign to the Ninevites that Jonah lied. And as Jesus Christ was a like sign, we must conclude that he lied also. Which is another proof of the "diabolical mood," and that Christ and the devil are one.

Fifthly and lastly—any many other signs.

This as before, intimated, would on first sight, go to prove that there was a lie out somewhere. For it is first declared, there should be no sign, then one sign, then another sign, then again, many other signs. But where shall we saddle the lie, if there be a lie? "You let God be true, but every man a liar," including the Son of Man and Apostles, though they be infallible. But my friends, comparatively there isn't much of a lie. In fact, no lie at all. True, Jesus restored the sick, the blind, the deaf, the lame, the halt, the maimed, and raised the dead by the thousands. I suppose he did not make less than ten thousand new arms and legs for the people. Also Peter, Paul, Stephen, Philip, and many others, did many like signs and wonders before that generation. But lump all these thousands of lesser signs together, and pound them into one—yea, you may put in all the signs of the Old Testament—Moses and Aaron with their snakes, frogs, lice, &c., Joshua with his rams horns, Samson with his foxes, Gideon with his pitchers, Elijah with his ravens, Elisha with his bears, David with his ewe lamb, Solomon with his thousand wives and concubines, (it has always been a great mystery to me how he lived with so many) Isaiah and Jeremiah, with their sweeping destruction of cities and nations, Ezekiel with his "short cakes," Daniel with his lions, Jonah with his whale, and last, but by no means least, Shadrach, Mesach, and Abednego. For it must be admitted that they stood fire first rate—yes, and all these and it would be "a small fry"—a very small fry, compared with the sign of the Son of Man. Comparatively, it would be barely admissible to say, the sign of the Son of Man, and another sign. But how much more appropriate the sacred text, "There shall no sign be given this generation; but the sign of the Son of Man."

Christian Charity.

A few weeks before the great fire in Chicago, (1871) the writer read from a morning paper of that city, that on the night before the reading referred to, an unfortunate woman from the street called at the Young Men's Christian Association, asked for shelter and food. She was enquired of if she had a recommendation. Coming from the street and a life of shame, of course she had not. She was turned away and returned to the street, contemplating suicide. While in this condition she met on the street one of her own sex and life, who listened to her story, took her to her hearth and home and there supplied her needs. The reading of this narrative lead to the following thoughts:

"Christian young men," of noted fame,
The suffering ones of earth proclaim
Their want and suffering in your ear,
Why will you not their pleadings hear?
Ye seek the pinnacle of fame,
Did Jesus ever seek that name?
Your useless creeds, did he profess?
His mission saved—should yours do less?
Not long since, at your door, there stood
A sister, asking shelter, food;
With heavy heart she turned away.
She brought no character that day.
Out in the dark, she sorrowing went,
Back to a life, so illy spent,
She had bowed her head in condemnation.
To a "Young Men's Christian Association."
Back to a life of sin and shame,
Back to disgrace, from which she came;
She stood aghast with consternation.
For she'd seen a "Christian Association."
With no place for rest, nor a morsel of food.
This prospective suicide, trembling stood
At the threshold of death, when another drew nigh,
And the Christ, in her nature said, "Lo, here am I!"
Her means were but scanty, though her heart was large.
And this bowed down and weak one she took in her charge
Gave her raiment and food, took her to her heart,
Thus acting in truth the Samaritan's part.
Now tell me, ye Christians of popular fame,
If your work is not all in a high-sounding name?
And were Jesus to come, imploring for food,
Would you not first inquire "Is your character good?"
"CONSISTENCY THOU ART A JEWEL."

ELECTRIC science occupies a place of no mean importance in the new opera-house in Paris. A special room is set apart as a battery-room, in which 300 Bunsen's cells arranged in sets of 60 on rough plate-glass tables, are manipulated to pass a current to any part of the stage, as to direct the electric light upon any point of the scenery.

New-York Liberal Club.

320TH MEETING, FRIDAY EVENING, NOV. 19TH, 1875.

HUGH BYRON BROWN read the following paper, to a full, intelligent, and appreciative audience:

The God Idea in History.

It is safe to affirm that no one conception of the human brain has played so important a part in the affairs of mankind as that of the God idea.

Up from the first dawn of reason, through all the stages of his progress, THIS, more than all others, has been instrumental in moulding man's character, controlling his actions, shaping society and determining the polity of nations.

Nor is this statement at variance with the now recognized fact, that a man's God is only the offspring of his brain, and therefore a true measure of his intellectual and moral status; for the conception being only a projection of man himself, the characters both of the creature and its creator are mutually influenced and modified by each other.

It has been well said, "Show me the character of a God, and I will disclose to you the character of his worshippers." The converse of that statement is also equally true.

So universal and so firmly imbedded is this belief in human consciousness, that were not the doctrine of innate ideas an impossibility, this might well be deemed to be such.

So tenacious is the mind of this theological conception that even after the grounds on which it rests have been swept away by modern criticism and scientific research, the intellect, though convinced of its falsity, seeks, rather than to abandon its idol, to retain it by substituting abstractions and ideals in place of the anthropomorphic conceptions which it can no longer worship.

So long as the doctrine of innate ideas obtained, its denial was hardly possible, for its universality and the intensity with which the conviction was held, precluded denial or question, and proved a bar to all progress.

This prolific source of error, which vitiated all the reasoning of both the ancients and moderns, having been happily discovered, and in a measure abandoned, we are free to continue our pursuit after truth without the trammels and impediments that hampered and misled the early thinkers.

I propose to consider, 1. The origin of the God idea.

2. The wants in human nature to which it administers.

3. Its influence on the character of the individual, and upon society.

4. What shall be its substitute when the intellect outgrows the theological conception.

To ascertain the origin of a belief that had its inception long before men had learned the art of recording their thoughts, either by monumental inscriptions or on parchment, is necessarily attended with great difficulties; nor are there wanting more than one plausible hypothesis claiming to be the only true solution of the problem. But no mind free from the trammels of superstition, can, after a careful study of the works of Dupuis, Volney, Strauss, Muller and others, resist the conviction that their solution is the true one, and that it can hardly admit of any other, namely, that the idea of a God is in its first origin, nothing but that of the physical powers of the Universe, considered sometimes as a plurality by reason of the variety of their phenomena, and sometimes as one simple and only being, by reason of their universality, and that all the theological dogmas on the nature of God, the manifestation of his person, and the origin of the world, are only the recital of astronomical facts well understood by their originators, but misconceived and confounded by subsequent generations.

After a long career of existence, akin to the lower animals, there came a time when primeval man awoke from the dullness and stupor of the animal to a contemplation of his condition in nature. "He early began to perceive that he was subject to forces superior to his own, and independent of his will. The thunder and lightning awed and terrified him; the sun enlightened and warmed him; the fire burned, the wind chilled, the cold froze, and the water drowned him: all the powers of nature acted upon him powerfully and irresistibly."

These reflections awoke within him sensations of pleasure and pain; of good and evil, power and weakness; and, as a matter of course, he learned to desire and love such as gave him pleasure, and to hate and shun that which gave him pain.

The next step in this evolution of thought, was an effort to obtain the pleasurable and to shun the painful.

It was natural for him to conclude that a force could emanate only from a being like himself; and from his own experience with his fellows, it was equally natural to conclude that a being mightier, and more powerful than he, could, by adulation or offerings, be induced to forbear to harm, and to confer desirable gifts—hence the origin of God and all systems of worship.

At this stage of his development, the mind of primitive man must necessarily have been attracted to the heavens, by reason of its wonderful phenomena, no less than the intimate relations they bear to the world in which he lived; nor could he fail to perceive, that upon the sun, more than upon all other celestial objects, depended, not alone his happiness, but his very existence. The sun, then, from the remotest antiquity, became the supreme object of man's worship, and, transmitted from generation to generation, and from nation to nation, under various names and disguises, and modified by climate, language and race, is still the God which we ignorantly worship.

It is curious and instructive to trace the evolution of this idea from its origin through all its different phases, and to mark the changes that climate, race and language have made on this conception.

Seen through the brilliant imagination of our Aryan ancestors all the phenomena of the heavens had some analogy or relation to some important event, pursuit, or thing with which they were familiar. The star that arose above the horizon coincident with some periodical event, as the bringing forth of young, or the germination of vegetation, was supposed to preside over that function or period. The fleeting clouds, or bright gods, related to their herds of cows. Night or darkness, personified evil—light, good, and their seeming antagonism, a warfare between them.

From this fancied analogy between the phenomena of the sky, and the affairs and things of earth—and the projection of the latter into the heavens, together with the custom of primeval man to apostrophize and personify the powers of Nature—the subsequent step of mistaking the impersonal for a person, and the imaginary for the real, was an easy and natural one.

This transition from the impersonal to personal was first made and reduced to a system of worship, by the early Greeks, by whom it was transmitted to the Romans.

The God idea to the Greeks, assumed the aspect of plurality; every department and relation of life having a Deity assigned to it, who was believed to have exclusive jurisdiction over the affairs of that relation.

That which the writers of the Zend books apostrophized as astronomical phenomena, became in Greek polytheism actual and real gods and goddesses—all the minor phenomena being transformed by the vivid imagination of that people into the intrigues and loves of the gods.

Less imaginative nations made the mistake of confounding the signs and symbols used to represent the astronomical phenomena with the things symbolized, as, for instance, the worship of the Bull, the Virgin and other objects which were originally only projections of terrestrial things into the heavens from a fancied resemblance to, or connection with the stars, and which subsequently became symbols or signs of the twelve constellations of the zodiac.

This, together with the natural tendency of the rude savage to project his passions, and subjective conceptions into inanimate objects, is unquestionably the origin of Fetishism as practiced by some of the ancient nations.

That the fundamental ideas underlying all the principal religions, Christianity included, are of an astronomical character, and have direct reference to natural phenomena, will be apparent on noting the similarity and significance of the principal ideas, symbols and ceremonies of all the ancient religions.

For instance, all religions are based on two principles, light and darkness, or good and evil, which ideas were, no doubt, derived from the natural division of time into day and night.

The God, born of a Virgin, who is overcome and slain by his opponent, the Prince of Darkness; but who arises from the dead and triumphantly ascends on high, can be no other than the sun, which at the winter solstice appears to be overcome by the Prince of Darkness; but who is born again at the new year, and again ascends, and increases until he conquers his enemy, Darkness, and reigns supreme.

The gospel story of Christ and his twelve disciples, is unmistakably an allegory of the sun and the twelve constellations of the zodiac.

The serpent of Genesis, which also plays an important part in all the ancient religions, is only a symbol of darkness which introduced evil, or winter, into the world, from which evil we are redeemed by the Savior, the sun of Spring or the Lamb of God, having reference to the season of reproduction of all life and beauty.

The decorations of the Christian's altar and the Pagan's temple, the sign of the cross and architectural designs of places of worship, have all a significance derived from physical nature.

The priest's tonsure is the disk of the sun, his stole is the zodiac, his rosaries are symbols of the stars and planets; the mitre, the crozier, and the mantle of the bishop, are those of Osiris, the sun God of the Egyptians.

After a careful study and comparison of the cosmogonies, philosophy, ethics and doctrines of all the religions, the conclusion is irresistible that the fundamental ideas of them all are identical, and that the central idea of the Indian, Persian, Jew, Christian and Mohammedan is one and the same.

The Bacchus, Adonis, and Hercules of the Greeks and Romans; the Osiris of the Egyptians, the Jehovah of the Jews, the Christ of the Christians and the one only God of the Koran, being no other than the Sun, that great dispenser of light and life; the Creator of all things!

But the God idea once fairly grounded in human consciousness, found other manifestations less imaginative, but no less injurious to human welfare.

The same causes which led savage and rude men to fear and worship the forces of Nature, led them also to invest the most powerful of their tribe with the titles and attributes of the gods. As men progressed, the divine titles and worship were withheld, while the authority of the ruler was still deemed to be of divine origin. Later, the divine authority became simply a divine right, which in time is also abandoned, and the sovereign becomes distinguished only as the representative of the government, with no attributes or qualities different from common mortals.

But notwithstanding that this idea of a personal Supreme Being has no actual existence, the conception in the mind is a fact nevertheless; nor does it follow that because the object which the idea is supposed to represent is a myth, that the idea itself can subserve no good use and must necessarily share the fate of the discarded idol and be cast aside as a worn-out toy that served to amuse our infantile mind, but which we have wholly outgrown.

Whatever, either of institutions, customs or ideas, that have permanently established themselves in the mind or in human society, indicates a want to which they administer; however the increase of knowledge and the expansion of the mind may modify and change them; the needs, to which they administer, if natural, remain unchanged, for human nature is ever the same, whether found among the polar snows, or the tropical sun, whether in the unlettered savage or the civilized man. In this sense, if in no other, the aphorism of "whatever is, is right," is true.

But what are these uses in human nature which the God idea subserves? One use—and the one that makes men so reluctant to abandon it—is that sense of peace and safety that springs from a firm belief and trust in a beneficent power, stronger and wiser than themselves, who is conscious of their existence, who cares for them and who will save them, not only from the dangers of this life, but from those of an imaginary future.

It is the same feeling experienced by the child while under the care and protection of its parents, knowing its weakness and limitations is happy in the thought that there is one stronger and greater, who will protect and care for it.

All, at times, have moments of disquietude and despondency, when the game of life seems hardly worth the playing, when the star of hope seems for the time to have set, when the burden of life seems so heavy that we would fain lay it down and be at rest. It is in moments like these that the depressed spirit seeks strength and consolation in a power higher than itself. It is this feeling of weakness that finds utterance, and at the same time consolation and strength, in such poetic invocations as,

"Jesus, lover of my soul Help me to thy bosom fly."

"Rock of ages cleft for me Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Guide, me oh thou great Jehovah,
Pilgrim through this barren land,
I am weak, but thou art mighty.
Hold me by thy powerful hand."

But the strength and consolation flowing from this belief are possible only when the intellect is in harmony with the belief. When the time comes, as come it must to every individual, when the intellect can no longer sanction the theological conception, then follows a period of anguish and mental anarchy in which the soul pines like an orphan child for the support on which it had learned to lean.

Another use which this idea subserves, is that of an outlet for the emotional nature of man, as well as a source of inspiration and an incitement to noble effort.

It is true that this side of our nature finds a partial vent and satisfaction in passion attraction and in the pursuit of the fine arts—still it is incomplete. Our nature demands a higher and more unselfish ideal in order to inspire our highest thoughts and noblest efforts.

An absorbing passion for one of the opposite sex, or for high art, has, in many, a refining and ennobling effect, but there is in such an exclusive devotion an element of selfishness and limitation which (except in rare cases) fails to call out the highest and best in our natures. To inspire the highest aspirations, and to excite to great and unselfish deeds, we must have an ideal, a most high; in a word, an impersonal and altruistic God, who shall be not only a subjective conception, but an objective fact. This God, I need scarcely add, can be no other than the divine humanity.

A third want of human nature, to which the God idea administers is, that it serves as a model for the formation of character, and a guidance for human conduct. Notwithstanding the fact that a god is just what his worshippers make him, it is likewise true that the virtues and attributes attributed to him are higher and nobler than those possessed by the majority of his worshippers, and until they have outgrown the conception, the reverence and respect with which we regard our ideal must necessarily assimilate our characters and lives to our divine ideal.

It is not true, as many suppose, that were all theological ideas of God and worship obliterated that men would instinctively do right, be virtuous and act wisely. Right doing, virtuous actions and wisdom are no more a natural and spontaneous growth in man than are the rarest flowers and finest fruits in the vegetable kingdom; the former, no less than the latter, are the results of careful and continuous culture. The germs of everything good and great are indeed inherent in human nature, but without culture they may lie dormant or be crowded out by the rank weeds of vice and crime. Man is proverbially a creature of education, and it is only as the conditions of his life, both pre and post-natal, are favorable to virtue, that he will bring forth the best human fruit. He needs not only a rich soil, culture, and a favorable situation like the plant, but unlike it, he requires a culture that shall regulate his passions, direct his energies and teach him to substitute, as the rule of his life, altruism for egotism. This he will do, and become, only in the degree that the God or ideal that he worships inculcates or inspires.

But whether fact or fable, it must needs be that a conception so widely diffused, and so tenaciously held, must have been, as it still in a measure is, a power either for good or evil. The unphilosophical iconoclast on the one hand, affirms with much reason, that the greater part of the woes and miseries suffered by mankind has proceeded directly from superstition, and whose fierce but honest indignation against the cause of so much evil, finds fitting expression in the terrible indictment of Shelley:

"Priests have three words; well tyrants know their use,
Well pay them for the loan, with usury
Torn from a bleeding world! God, Hell and Heaven!
A vengeful, pitiless, and almighty fiend,
Whose mercy is a nick-name for the rage
Of tameless tigers, hungering for blood!
Hell, a red gulf of everlasting fire,
Where poisonous and undying worms prolong
Eternal misery to those hapless slaves
Whose life has been a penance for their crimes,
And Heaven, a meed for those who dare belie
Their human nature, quake, believe and cringe
Before the mockeries of earthly power!"

The Christian, on the other hand, regards the idea of God as the source and fountain of all virtue, without which society could not exist, and in the absence of which life would not be desirable.

The truth in this, as in most cases of dispute, lies at neither extreme, but will be found somewhere between.

It has been very truthfully shown by Auguste Comte that the very worst institutions, governmental or ecclesiastic, that the world has ever known, were not without their uses and advantages to mankind, the truth of which statement becomes more and more apparent as the doctrine of evolution becomes better known and understood.

Feudalism, slavery and despotism are no doubt great evils and the source of terrible suffering and misery when they persist in remaining after they have been outgrown. But there was a time in the history of the race when they were indispensable, and did for it just what was required to be done at that stage of human development. They taught savage men obedience and submission to authority; put a restraint upon his passions; attached him to the soil, and made him useful to society, thus preparing the way for a higher civilization.

That superstition, which has its root in the God idea, has been a terrible curse to mankind no student of history will deny. It could not be otherwise than that ambitious priests and kings should seize on a conviction so powerful and universal, to accomplish their own selfish ends.

In the hands of such cruel and unscrupulous ecclesiastics as Torquemada, Sextus II., Diego Derza and such rulers as Henry VIII. and Bloody Mary of England; Charles V. and his son, Phillip II., of Spain; Charles IX. and Catherine de Medici, of France, it is not strange that it became a terrible foe to human happiness—a promoter of discord and strife among men—disturbing the peace of the nations and filling Europe with slaughter, rapine and ruin!

Two pictures drawn by the master minds of Lecky and Buckle, shall suffice to show what a fearful source of mischief the God conception and its co-relative ideas were in the politics of Europe for centuries, and what the character and condition of a noble and brave nation was when this idea and its co-relatives became the dominant thought and concern of its people. These pictures are not overdrawn, as indeed it would be impossible for language to express what humanity in the past has been called to suffer and endure from superstition.

"We are assured by Lorente that the number of persons burnt by the Spanish Inquisition was 31,000, while 290,000 were condemned to punishment little less severe than death. The number of those who were put to death for their religion in the Netherlands alone, in the reign of Charles V., has been estimated by good authority at 50,000, and at least half as many perished under his son. And when to these memorable instances we add the innumerable less conspicuous executions that took place from the victims of Charlemagne to the Freethinkers of the seventeenth century; and when we recollect that the area of persecution composed nearly the whole of Christendom, and that its triumph was in many instances so complete as to destroy every memorial of the contest, the most callous nature must recoil with horror from the spectacle! Nor did the victims perish by a brief and painless death, but by one the most poignant that man can suffer. They were burnt alive, not unfrequently by a slow fire. This was the physical torment inflicted on those who dared to exercise their reason in the pursuit of truth.

"And when the mother or wife saw the body of him who was dearer to her than life, dislocated, and writhing and quivering with pain, and watched the slow fire creeping from limb to limb until it had smothered him in a sheet of agony, and when at last the scream of anguish had died away, she was told that all this was acceptable to the God she served, and was but a faint image of the sufferings that he would inflict through eternity upon the dead."

"And besides all these things, we have to remember those frightful massacres, perhaps the most fearful the world has ever seen—the massacre of the Albigenses, which a Pope had instigated, or the massacre of St. Bartholomew, for which a Pope returned solemn thanks to Heaven. We have to recollect those religious wars which reproduced themselves century after century, with scarcely diminishing fury, which turned Syria into Aeldama, which inundated with blood the fairest lands of Europe, which blasted the prosperity and paralyzed the intellect of many a noble nation, and which planted animosities in Europe that two hundred years have been unable to destroy.

And when we consider that all this was but part of one vast conspiracy to check the development of the human mind, and to destroy the spirit of impartial and unrestricted inquiry which all modern researches prove to be the very first condition of progress, as of truth, it can scarcely be no exaggeration to say, that the Church of Rome has inflicted a greater amount of unmerited suffering than any other religion that has ever existed among mankind!"

"To wish for more than was necessary to keep one's self alive, was a sin as well as a folly, and was a violation of the subjection we owe to God. To be poor, dirty and hungry; to pass through life in misery, and to leave it with fear; to be plagued with boils and sores and diseases of every kind; to be always sighing and groaning, to have the face streaming with tears and the chest heaving with sobs; in a word, to suffer constant affliction, and to be tormented in all possible ways; to undergo these things was deemed a proof of goodness, just as the contrary was a proof of evil. It mattered not what a man liked; the mere fact of his liking it made it sinful. Whatever was natural was wrong."

"The clergy deprived the people of their holidays, their amusements, their shows, their games and their sports; they repressed every appearance of joy; they forbade all merriment; they stopped all festivities; they choked up every avenue by which pleasure could enter, and they spread over the country a universal gloom. Then truly did darkness sit on the land. Men in their daily actions and in their looks, became troubled, melancholy and ascetic. Their countenances soured and were downcast. Not only their opinions, but their gait, their demeanor, their voice, their general aspect were influenced by that deadly blight, which nipped all that was genial and warm. The way of life fell into the sear and yellow leaf; its gradually deepened bloom faded and passed off; its spring, its freshness, its beauty were gone; joy and love either disappeared, or were forced to hide themselves in obscure corners, until at length the fairest and most endearing parts of our nature being constantly repressed, ceased to bear fruit and seemed to be withered into perpetual sterility. Thus it was that the natural character of the Scotch was in the seventeenth century dwarfed and mutilated."

Terrible as this picture of human suffering is, it but imperfectly represents the actual condition of Europe for centuries.

It is no answer to this terrible indictment to say that the atrocities of the Inquisition, the religious wars and persecutions of which the history of Christendom is full, were not a legitimate outgrowth of a belief in God, for the reason that all wrong, cruelty and injustice are expressly condemned and forbidden by God in his so-called will.

Assuming such a revelation possible, and admitting that all wrong and injustice are prohibited therein, it still remains true that the same books are full of examples of cruelty and bloodshed, which have the express sanction and authority of their so-called author.

But setting all sacred books aside, it is evident from the very nature of the case, that the logical sequence of the one-God idea must be just what history discloses it to have been—an element of discord, and the prime cause of persecution, war and poverty.

God, says the theist, exists supreme. He is a jealous God. He hates his enemies, loves those who obey and serve him, and will punish the former and reward the latter. A denial of his existence, or an honest difference of belief in regard to his character or requirements, is a crime; for he who "believeth shall be saved, but he who believeth not shall be damned." To the Church he has committed the keys of heaven. "Whatsoever it bindeth on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever it loosed on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

As he hated and destroyed his enemies, as recorded in his will; and as his people have been made by him the custodian of his honor and the defender of his cause, therefore the suppression of all opinions derogatory to his honor or to religion, and the punishment of the promulgators of such opinions is a duty which the Church may not disregard where she has the power to enforce it. Such is the inevitable conclusion from the Christian's assumption of a personal God.

That this and its co-relative ideas have been a source of inspiration and a solace to millions, cannot be denied; that it has afforded consolation and cheered the fainting heart under the burdens and trials of life, thousands can testify; that the hopes of another "existence when life's toilsome day is o'er," where we shall be united to our loved and lost, has been a balm and a solace to the bereaved heart, is unquestionable. But on the other hand, it is also true that the same belief has caused unspeakable anguish and despair to millions of the human race. While the merciful God or the heavenly Father has inspired and blessed, the angry and revengeful God has awed and terrified.

If the hope of heaven has inspired and strengthened, the fear of hell has depressed and enslaved. If the bereaved heart has been comforted by the hope of a reunion with its idols, it has also been filled with anguish and despair, when from unbelief or the dictum of a priest, the door of heaven has been shut upon them. If, like Bunyan's pilgrim, the believer is at times on the Delectable Mountain, he is also more frequently like him in the Slough of Despond, or in the hands of Giant Despair.

The same may be said of its influence on society as upon the individual. If pernicious in the extreme at one time, and in certain directions it was at other times and in other directions equally beneficial. It could hardly be otherwise than that such a power should be used for good as well as for evil, for such is the nature of all power.

When priests and rulers used this power, as they frequently did, to compel obedience to wholesome laws and police regulations, to the conquest and subduing of rude and turbulent passions, and to the performance of acts of mercy and charity, it becomes as powerful for good as when differently used, it was for evil.

Had it not been for this wholesome fear of supernatural punishments and hope of rewards, it is difficult to see how the rude savage could have been induced to abandon his nomadic habits of life which is the first step in progress, and to submit his rude will and turbulent passions to the requirements of social order. But for this wholesome check, what could have induced him to forego his revenge and submit his cause to the civil magistrate; or what could have induced him to tell the truth when summoned as a witness before the court? What but this could have compelled him to forego a present animal gratification, which he could enjoy only by the violation of the rights of another? In a word, it is difficult to imagine what power other than this could have been instrumental in causing primitive man to take the first necessary step that leads to civilization.

It is easy to comprehend now, after the progress that has been made, and after the gradual formation of a moral sense, and a public opinion in favor of the right and the true, how man can be good and do right without the fear of an angry God or hope of future reward, but it is difficult to see now what agency other than superstition, could have effected so great a revolution in the incipency of man's development. It was the ladder by which the race ascended; the scaffolding on which the work was done and the building reared, and as such, should be valued, laid aside when no longer required.

We come now to the inquiry, "Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifices?" a question a pertinent to-day as when uttered by the Argau poet in the early dawn of civilization. Will the God idea continue, as in the past, to be a cherished faith and a dominant power in the affairs of men? or will it, like many another sweet and charming illusion of our infancy, vanish in time, like youth and beauty, never to return?

The key that will unlock the future of this, as of many other difficult problems, is the principle of evolution. We have but to mark the changes that have taken place in the minds of men in reference to the God conception, to be able to predict its future.

By comparing the conception of God as held by different nations and by people of different degrees of civilization, we find that it becomes less gross and anthropomorphic in proportion as the masses become enlightened and refined.

The God of the nineteenth century is not the same God, except in name, that the men of the fifteenth worshipped; and the conception as it lies in the mind of a scientist is quite different from that in the mind of the rustic.

Like the chameleon it assumes the complexion of the mind through which it is viewed.

The first conception of God in the savage mind must necessarily have been grossly anthropomorphic, for man cannot imagine or conceive of anything having essential qualities different from the determination of his own nature. Man being the only animal so far as we know that has a consciousness of consciousness is enabled to think of himself either subjectively or objectively. God is nothing more or less than a projection of man himself; that is to say, it is simply the subjective nature of man viewed objectively. Hence the reason why, when the intellectual and moral character of a people change the character of their God undergoes a similar modification.

But when the intellect has outgrown the theological conception, what then, if anything, will take its place?

With some, no doubt, the subjective conception will die out with the objective fact, or be relegated to the realm of the unknown and unknowable, as indeed all but the human part of the conception must be, for as the mind is conditioned in time and space it cannot take cognizance of the absolute or the infinite. To such the pursuit of science, the cultivation of the mind and the worship of art will in a measure supply the place of the old faith, and to some, may fully satisfy all their needs. Others, in whom the imaginative and the emotional predominate, and in whom the sense of weakness and the sentiment of worship is strong, will still cling to an abstraction as a substitute for the old God.

When driven from the personal, they will find him in the impersonal; if he may no longer be worshiped in the concrete they will bow down to him in the abstract; if he is no longer contained in a part he shall be found in the whole.

Such will find consolation and repose in the all-God, who Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,

Glow in the stars and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, operates unspent,
Breathes in our soul informs our mortal part,
As full, as perfect in a hair as heart.
* * * * *
To him no high, no low, no great, no small,
He fills, no bounds, connects and equals all."

But, however suitable the no God or the all God may be to a few, neither can fully meet and supply all the needs of the mass of mankind. The only God, that can take the place of the old, and be to men all, and more than the theological conception, is the Divine Humanity, the only true Supreme Being who is at once a subjective idealization and an objective reality. "This grand organism of which individual man is but an organ or cell sums up all knowledge, feeling and activity.

"In and by it we live and move and have our being; it contains not only all the past and the present, but will embrace all that shall be. All who have served humanity, and who have worked with it are still a part of it. The forces that worked through our ancestors exist in us to-day, and will be reproduced in those that come after us. The phenomenal only remains, and is permanent—all else is transient and perishable. To the sense of weakness and dependence in the individual man it offers the aggregate strength of the grand man."

To the emotional side of man's nature it furnishes an outlet and an unlimited scope for its exercise; for the affections being human cannot attach to an abstraction, or to a God without a human side.

It is only in proportion as the theological God is endowed with human attributes, that he enlists and secures the affections of the masses.

The jealous and bloody Jehovah of the Jews attracts only those who are on a similar plane, which ideal, re-acting on the worshiper, intensifies and perpetuates those qualities.

The stern and unsympathizing God of the Puritans called forth only the emotion of fear and awe; while the tender Heavenly Father and the Virgin Mother found ever a ready response in the human bosom, which while it consoled and helped the worshiper, enriched and enlarged his affectional nature and found expression at last in acts of charity and kindness to his fellow-men.

The superhuman, the unreal and the mystical having been eliminated, leaving nothing but the human, the new conception inspires to noble actions and ennobles the actor, because, having no selfish heaven to win, nor hell to shun, it appeals only to the unselfish and noble part of man's nature. Instead of a Divine Providence which has a tendency to relax the sense of human responsibility, it substitutes a human providence, which, acting on its material environment, has created all that is valuable and useful in society. It is to humanity in the past, that we are indebted for everything we possess, and it should be our highest conception of duty to do as much for posterity as our ancestors did for us.

It is to this great, yet imperfect God, to whom "we shall offer our sacrifices," which sacrifices shall consist of an entire abnegation of self and self-seeking, and an entire consecration of ourselves to that great Being, of which we are each an infinitesimal part. To the new God we will transfer all our loyalty, devotion and love, and while hoping for no objective immortality, find the highest satisfaction and peace in doing our duty with the assurance that nothing accomplished can ever be lost, and that the results of our lives shall live in posterity as those of our ancestors live in us.

The lecture was freely and warmly applauded, and an animated discussion followed.

S. P. ANDREWS approved of the object, matter, and style of the lecture, and was in favor of all sides of these great questions being examined. He believed the speaker of the evening, and every intelligent person in the city, and in the whole world, would accept that the God of the future should be recognized as the Most High. He recommended the acceptance of the term. The question would arise, What is the Most High? He believed that a great majority of mankind would place it where the orator of the evening had done.

MR. HERMON SHOOK mildly criticized the lecture and defended the Bible God. He affirmed that the idea of the Messiah—the Son of God—being part divine and part human, was the grandest conception that had ever taken hold of the human mind, and favored joining in marriage the idea of altruism and egotism, and could not see that the positions of the lecturer varied greatly from those laid down in the Bible.

MR. HENRY EVANS spoke of the difference between the modern conception of humanity and Christianity. The former embraces all who have contributed to the welfare of this world. The immortality of man is the result of his character and action during his existence here. It does not offer to man an eternity of psalm singing and idleness, for professing to believe what is impossible so believe. He wished Mr. A. to give an intelligent idea of what the "Most High" is. To him it had no foundation. To the pick-pocket "the Most High" meant to get off with a well-filled pocket book. He regarded the idea as opposed to religion and conducive to anarchy. The function of religion is to bind up individuals into a unit—a great conception towards which man can rally. He alluded in a terse manner, to the effect Mohammedanism had had to bind together the disintegrated and diverse tribes of Western Asia. He admitted that the theological conception of God had been of use in the world, and he accepted the good it had accomplished; but he doubted whether any higher conception can be formed of God, than is embraced in collective humanity, which embraces all we can think or feel. Any other idea of the "Most High" had no sympathy with the human race—a despot. He said it was one of the most marvelous things in the world, how a little tribe of scrofulous Arabs established a religion that dominated the world; no wonder that it had been called miraculous. It was wonderful. Modern thought is in opposition to the God of the past. When Christianity was the ruling power, it could make the proudest king bow down and beg forgiveness. We shall have a proper religion when we have a moral power of public opinion that will make people respect the rights of other people and do their duty.

DR. EDWARD NEWBERRY said that when he looked at the records of past Egypt, Greece, and Rome, he found man the same as now, and with the same attributes. The religious sentiment always existed more or less in man. The same creative laws had always existed as now, and it was hard to conceive that there was ever a time when man did not exist. He alluded at some length to his early recollections and impressions upon theological questions.

MR. A. H. H. DAWSON made some very humorous remarks showing the ridiculous features of the Christian theory that the inhabitants of a whole world were doomed to the tortures of a never-ending hell, because nearly six thousand years ago, an old woman ate an apple. He thought it small business for God to spend his time in damning souls. He thought he had been acquainted with some whose souls were so small, that it was derogatory to God to suppose he ever created them, or that he would spend his time damning them. Why, if a large number of such souls could be placed in a pill box, a homeopathic dose of damnation would amply suffice for the entire lot. He said he disliked to talk upon religious subjects or Christianity; they were too funny; he preferred something more serious.

MR. WILCOX spoke in moderate criticism of the lecture.

T. B. WAKEMAN followed with some able remarks but we took no notes, and cannot do him justice. He scouted the idea of the Most High that had been advanced, and pronounced it a fraud, indefinite, unmeaning and an idea upon which two persons could scarcely agree. In combined humanity he recognized all the elements and qualities worthy our adoration.

H. B. BROWN, the lecturer of the evening, closed with some very timely remarks, explanatory and elucidative of the positions he had occupied in the lecture. The entire evening passed off very pleasantly.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH lectured before the Club on Friday evening, Nov. 26th, but too late for a report.

THE REV. MR. KALLOCH, of California, formerly of Massachusetts, thinks that there is no more sin in going to a theatre than in going to a church festival, but that young men should not go to either when their washing bills are unpaid.

Special Notices.

(In this column short notices will be inserted at 10 cts. a line.)

If there is one thing behind the age more than another, it is the privy system. Except in a few of the larger cities where water-closets are used, there has been no improvements since the earliest civilization which compares at all with that suggested in the circular of the Wakefield Earth Closet Company of 36 Dey street, New York.

ALL who think difficult cases cannot be cured by DR. R. P. FELLOWS' Magnetized Powder (Nature's greatest remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of all nervous and chronic diseases), are invited to read the following voluntary and unsolicited testimonials extracted from letters of patients treated in this way by DR. FELLOWS, Ira N. Masson, M.D., of Marakesan, Wis., writes: "Your Powder has done me good. The pain in my side and back is removed. The rheumatic affliction of the arms is removed, and I feel much relieved." M. Healsey, of Wheeling, W. Va., writes: "Your Powder is all taken, and I am happy to say I can now hear the clock strike and tick distinctly for the first time in three years." Theodocia Blair, of Rowley, Iowa, writes: "I have taken your Powder, and I have so much improved that I can eat and sleep better than I have for years. I feel almost young again." Lydia Barber, of Woodstock, Ill., writes: "Before taking your Powder, I could not sleep. I was bloated so I could neither sit or lie with any comfort. I had spells that it seemed my heart did not beat, and that I could not breathe; but now I am entirely cured by its use." E. Casterline, of Belmont, N. Y., writes: "When your last package of Powders came to hand, I was suffering from a severe fever-headache, pain in my side and bones, but when I took your Powder my bad feelings left me almost instantly." For the want of space, interesting quotations from letters of patients in other States are omitted. The foregoing are only samples of those daily received by DR. R. P. FELLOWS from all parts of the world. The Powder is $1 per box. Address, Vineland, New Jersey.

THE NEW GOSPEL OF HEALTH.—This portly volume, to which we have heretofore referred in these columns, compels a still more hearty approval of its instructions with careful reading. It is one of those books which are for the times. Its practical object is, in brief phrase, to teach people how to replenish the springs of life, without drugs or stimulants. It is profusely illustrated with pertinent cuts and engravings, which greatly assist in impressing its teachings on the reader's mind. An excellent likeness of the author faces the title page, and there is a likewise given an engraving of Hygieia, the Goddess of Health. There are thirty-eight appropriate sections to the book, each of which receives the fullest treatment from advanced minds. The contents were communicated by a band of spirit physicians who occupied a high position in their profession when on earth, and who are now rendered capable of imparting a profound knowledge of the principles and laws which govern physical health. There are among the names of this band: Benjamin Rush, Sir Arthur Clarke, Arago, Mesmer, James Rush, Reichenbach, James Y. Simpson, Eliaphlet Nott, Valentine Mott, Ira Warren, Luther V. Bell, J. Hughes Bennett, and John Abernethy. They treat on a wide variety of topics, in which are comprehended the whole system of physical care and cure. Among them we mention the brain, the blood, vital magnetism, consumption, odyllic force, drunkenness; and drinks, the stomach, womanhood and maternity, the skin, insanity, the food, the nerves, and so forth. The list is made up of all the points in physical life which ever raise questions and excite speculations and it is but speaking the simple truth to say that each topic is treated with scientific precision and exhaustively.

Dr. Stone himself contributes of his own knowledge and experience to these, treating of subjects which the reader will meet with as he proceeds. The real and sole aim of the New Gospel of Health is to teach every one to be his or her own healer by understanding the rule and reason of self-cure, the means being inherent in the constitution and not outside of it. Above all, it aims to bring to an end the reign of drugs and doctors' pills and boluses. It teaches that the amount of vital capital or momentum each person possesses is just proportioned to a sound and well organized constitution, and normally inherited tendencies, and that this capital is to be continued as the organism is constantly renewed, obedient to organic laws which are inflexible. Above all, it instructs one in the power of sympathy as a healing gift, and that natural healers are to be found in every household, and how they may be developed and made self-reliant healers, magnetizers or psychologists. It likewise preaches the doctrine of nutrition as the means of recuperation for the waning vital stamina; and hence that a correct knowledge of the requisite elements of food or primates must be scientifically acquired. And it demonstrates the truth that as mankind more and more tend to the artificial and the false in living, diseases change correspondingly, and defy the treatment of the medical theories of the olden times; and that though physicians multiply in the ratio of diseases, they have continued to miss the secret by not discovering that drug-taking cannot compensate for the infraction of plain physical laws. The book is an invaluable thesaurus of curative and preservative instruction for the mass, and the very humblest may take it home to himself, assured that it will help him to make his life long and happy on earth.—Banner of Light.

Synopsis of a Lecture on the subject of Christianity and Freethought.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

[Delivered at Yates City, Ill., November 14, 1875.]

After defining the sense in which the words Christianity and Freethought are used, the Lecturer proceeded to say that Christianity teaches the existence of a Being infinite in presence, yet a person; an individual, infinite in knowledge, and yet a contriver, planner, designer; infinite in power and love, yet the author of a world full of imperfections; unchangeable, yet at a certain time after a beginningless past, aroused from his sleep of ages, and by an imperative fiat spoke a universe into existence; made everything but himself, yet is not the author of evil; is free from infirmities, yet pleased and displeased every day.

Freethought (according to the materialistic school) teaches the self-existence, the eternity and sufficiency of nature; the universality and invariableness of natural law; that in the history of the Universe there has been evolution from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous; that worlds have cooled from a fire-mist, that animals and plants have come from simple beginnings; that as animal life runs insensibly into vegetable life, so the organic runs into the inorganic; that life is a form of force; that organic natural selection accounts for the adaptations of organisms to their environments; and that there is no room in nature, and no foundation in reason for a personal, infinite, unchangeable, prayer-answering Being, who existed before the Universe, knowing everything before there was anything except himself to know; and who, after an eternity of idleness, aroused and gratified a new desire by making a Universe out of nothing.

Christianity teaches the original perfection of everything. Freethought says the present condition of the world is the final term of an immense series of progressive changes. Christianity says that evil came from a devil, a creature made originally perfect by God. Freethought asks how imperfections can come from perfection, and inquires if a perfect being can fall, what assurance have we that God himself will not fall? Evil and good, we hold, are relative terms. What affects us favorably we call good; what injures us we call evil. All morality is founded on utility.

Christianity says man can be saved only through Christ. We hold man's condition improvable by his own efforts. We look to science, industry and morality for salvation; not to an individual who died eighteen hundred years ago. Christianity teaches that belief in the Christian system involves merit; disbelief, sin. We regard belief and unbelief as involuntary and without moral merit or demerit. Christianity says worship God. Freethought says worship is slavery. Let men spend their time and money in physical, intellectual and moral culture; not in telling God how great and wise he is, and how mean and miserable are the creatures he has made.

Christianity has a heaven for a portion, and an endless hell for a majority of the race; and this is a consoling religion! Freethought says wherever man may exist he must be fitted for his condition. An unbroken, everlasting sleep even affords no grounds for fear. How infinitely preferable to a future state in which millions will be forever miserable! Christianity claims the Bible as a revelation. We say the teachings of reason and the lessons of experience are man's only revelation. The Christian bids us believe every word of the Scriptures. We test them by the same rules of historic and moral criticism that we apply to Herodotus and Livy. For the Christian doctrine of prayer we substitute self-reliance. We remember that Fred. Douglass prayed for his freedom fifteen years, but, as he says, "the only prayer answered was the one made with his legs." "Trust in God and keep your powder dry," said Cromwell. On the same principle our religious friends, after building a church, don't neglect to attach lightning rods. They evidently believe with us that God would as soon destroy a church as a barn. Instead of teaching men about a heaven beyond the clouds, we urge the importance of trying to make a heaven on earth. This can never be realized till religious bigotry and fanaticism are destroyed. "One world at a time" is our motto. Instead of teaching hell, we aim to acquaint men with the natural penalties of wrong-doing. For preparing to die, we would substitute how to live. Death takes but a moment, and if we have any difficulty in dying, there are doctors always at hand to help us out of the world. But living is a science and an art that none of us fully understand. Moral goodness and philanthropy we think better than piety. We have too little of the former, too much of the latter. Instead of reverencing Jesus as an incarnate God, we esteem him as a brother and a benefactor. For baptism, we substitute bathing as a practice. We believe in water hydropathically, not spiritually. Instead of the clergy we would have scientists and men who could teach practical, useful knowledge. For the fables of the Bible, and the creeds of the middle-ages we would give the facts of modern science; for sectarianism, brotherhood; for love of God, love of men and a tender regard for every thing that feels in common with us the consciousness of existence.

Friendly Correspondence.

C. E. HOWD, New Haven, Conn., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER has now become a necessity with me. The longer I take it, the more I think of it.

S. E. FARWELL, Waverly, Iowa, writes: Do not fail to continue sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to me. I think it the most sensible paper published in the land.

S. WRIGHT, Coldwater, Mich., writes: I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the first paper I look at, out of the half dozen I take. I shall take it while it and I live.

JOHN GRIMSLEY, Corvallis, Oregon, writes: I am 83 years old and a Spiritualist. Some would think it strange that I continue taking THE TRUTH SEEKER. All good men and women should read it, and it must not languish for want of proper support.

JAMES COLE, Carlton, Mich., writes: Press on! give the hell-making, infant-damning, black-coat brigade, their just deserts, and drive them from this land forever. By the bye, how does it smell around Brooklyn, since the advent of Moody and Sankey?

S. L. RUFFNER, Dexter City, Mo., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very well, and think that it is getting better all the time. I wish it entire success. You are certainly doing a noble work for humanity, and should be sustained by all who love truth and philosophy better than superstition and ignorance.

A. V. HERMAN, Pleasant Hill, Neb., (in sending a list of six subscribers) writes: I hope that every one who wishes the advancement of Freethought and science and humanity, every one who would "shake off the shackles" of superstition, will send you as many subscribers as I do at present. Your paper ought to have one million subscribers in these United States.

R. J. LAMBORN, Glen Hall, Pa., writes: If it be claimed that truth is proved by the existence of its opposite—then error claims as much credit as truth—inasmuch as truth could not be established without it. If we could obtain no clear apprehension of the genuine were there no spurious with which to put it in contrast, then the existence of a counterfeit is essential to the proof of the genuine.

DAVID HARVEY, Washington Corners, Cal., writes: I see by the Investigator, that you are publishing a book, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers." Good! I think such a book will do more for the world than all the Bibles ever printed. Please register me for a copy. Science and Materialism are the saviors of the world. The race is indebted to them for all of the advancement it has made.

M. A. THOMPSON, St. John, Ill., writes: Your paper is invaluable. If eulogy was the only thing needful for your enterprises, you would probably be wealthy. But greenbacks seem to be essential for the maintenance of a Liberal paper in these times. My desire is that your sheet may be self-sustaining. This is all the prayer I recognize, having ceased formal prayer for three or four years past. I will write again soon if permitted, not by God (for I am not acquainted with the old gentleman,) but by the power which rules the universe.

J. A. RUTHERFORD, Honey Grove, Texas, writes: I was born Jan. 31st, 1790. I am writing by lamplight at 4 A. M. I am a constant reader and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yes, I think I shall want four copies of your promised book. I have one daughter and three sons. I feel that it would be well for me to present a copy of that book to each child. It would be of more worth to them than money. "The world does move!" I wish I could stay and see more of the grand revolution that is now going on. But I hope I shall look from the spirit land and rejoice in it.

LUCIUS SMITH, Brownsville, Vt., writes: Yes, I will take a copy of your forthcoming work, "The World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers." I wish to encourage his publication, because I want to get better acquainted with the great and good men of every era in the world's history. I know of no better way of getting introduced to such than through your book or of obtaining so much valuable information, and all so cheap. It will contain treasures gleaned from the centuries. A work displaying the most worthy characters of ancient and modern times cannot fail to add much to the pleasure and profit of its readers.

WM. E. COLEMAN, Leavenworth, Kansas, writes: Your famous letter to Immanuel J. C. has created quite a sensation here. The Liberals enjoy it much, but the orthodox are horrified. They say it is the most blasphemous, horrible thing they ever read. It has led to animated discussion, wherein I have endeavored to open the eyes of Christians. Already are they beginning to see things differently. We have lots of fun reading aloud the questions to I. J. C. about measles, leap-frog, loving the girls, &c. Even the Christians have to laugh at the phrase, "Immanuel J. Christ." I want about a dozen of those Letters in tract form. It is rich.

L. M. BENSON, M.D., Lowell, Wis., writes: I admire your paper much. I believe you are doing much good, and hope you will be rewarded even in this world. The basis of all true theology and religion is science, and I am glad to know that you are presenting this to your readers in an attractive form. I hope every liberal-minded man and woman in this country will feel it a duty to subscribe for your valuable paper. There are thousands of persons who pay their money freely for the support of doctrines which they do not believe, because they think it will add to their profit or popularity. If all such would lend their aid to the Liberal cause, it would soon be popular. I have advocated the Liberal cause for over thirty years, and can see great progress during this time.

MRS. RUTH W. SCOTT BRIGGS, W. Winfield, N. Y., writes: Please send extra papers, as I give away my regular copies. I keep all the Reform papers on the wing, for it seems wrong to file them away, as many do. There are many who do not know of these Liberal prints, or who cannot afford to subscribe for them. I have taken the Banner of Light from its birth, and have added to it the Crucible, Weekly, Toledo Sun, and THE TRUTH SEEKER. The latter I prize very highly for the way in which it handles, without gloves, the dogmas and creeds which still hold humanity in slavery and ignorance. I would like it still better if it treated more largely on Social, Political and Prison Reforms. I trust that it will receive the prosperity it merits, and that you may be blest in everything that pertains to your welfare.

J. BERKELEY, Washington, Texas, writes: I have just read your answer to Mr. Willicott in the Investigator of the 13th, and I am pleased at the dispassionate manner of your reply. Your belief, governed, as it appears to be, by the evidence you have received, is certainly in accordance with the heading of your publication—THE TRUTH SEEKER. And in my humble apprehension, if you failed to acknowledge and publish your evidence, you would not be acting the part of an outspoken man, to say the least. Hence, although I at present am no believer in spiritual communication, I am proud to see men with your influence come to the front, discarding outside influence, and condemning bigotry wherever found. Like you, I have seen evidence (in my own family) of an intelligent power outside (so far as I could detect) of the influence of the living. Now, what is it? I cannot solve the problem. As you suggest, time and science may unravel the mystery, and when the solution becomes a proved fact, I will accept it, lead whithersoever it will. As you well say: "I can see no objection to continued existence. When all the conditions are good, existence is certainly pleasant, and who will object to the proof? Let it come." I admire your desire to be a connecting link between the Liberal classes—their unity is much needed. There is much work before them in this century.

ELIJAH WOODARD, Leslie, Mich., writes: I accost you as a brother in the cause of human emancipation from all that makes the race unhappy. I am quite aged, (84) and read nearly every reformatory paper. I have before me THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 15th. I read your heading with much interest, and heartily endorse every word of it. Yourself and correspondents have much to say upon the Bible and theology: please indulge me a little. The theological system consists of allegorical personages derived from ancient mythology. It is one step in advance of paganism, as paganism is one in advance of fetishism, or the first step in the mental and moral progress of mankind. Ideas were first expressed by signs; second, by pictures; third, by allegorical representations; fourth, by sounds and an alphabet. What the ancients personified to represent human passions and faculties, the moderns have made personal and real. Hence, a personal God, Devil, a real material heaven and hell, names which in the original language had only a metaphorical signification. Judaism and ancient Christianity is a copy of pagan mythology, but of a higher development of the human mind. Until we get a correct understanding of pagan mythology, its allegorical personages, its pictures, fancies, and fables, we cannot rightly understand the Christian theology. Failing to do this, modern commentators have proved themselves a set of imbeciles and ninnyes. The human race is progressive. Before man outgrew fetishism and paganism, he was simple and honest. But as the priesthood grew up, rites and forms and ceremonies, knavery, craft and cunning, supplanted natural innocence and righteousness. Godology and demonology corrupted all the natural instincts of the human heart. As paganism was supplanted by Judaism, Judaism by Christianity, so Christianity and its Gods will be superseded by a more rational religion.

DANIEL TUTTLE, Poplar, O., writes: I have seen a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Friend Casey of South Carolina. He is a whole-souled Liberalist among the soul-saving cannibals, and he has in contemplation to start out as a missionary among the heathen of Zion. O, what a want there is for such laborers in the field! Never before was there such a harvest to gather. "Truth Seekers," Infidels, and all Liberals stand in need of organization. We want traveling missionaries. The Seavers, Bennetts, Petersons, and hosts of mental heros are doing a mighty work with their pens, but they are all located, and their arguments do not reach the dark holes of Godology and fiction. We want laborers in the field, as well as on the threshing floors and in the printing offices. There is need of knowledge. We want more Underwoods, more Wixons and Slenkers, more men and women in the field, preaching the true salvation of humanity. If I was young and rich, I would fill a trunk full of the Liberal documents of the times, and would enlist, not only for this mental war, but for the next, and would fight on until I saw all the gods and sons of virgins, all the ghosts, and popes, and priests, like thieving cowards, sneaking away. Now if Bro. Casey wants to enlist in this war of Right against Might, in this rebellion of Reason and Righteousness against Ignorance, Intolerance, and Debauchery, Falsehood, and every other crime, for Humanity's sake let every honest Liberal in the land help him forward. The whole world has begun to move in a scientific direction. The times, the crimes and all the infernalism now rampant in our country, demand an immediate advance upon the hosts of priestcraft, mythology, godology and sanctified fiction. When the penitentiaries of the land are filled with "reverend" scallywags of God; when adultery, perjury and debauchery are traded in market as "sacraments" of the Church; when the rulers of the land pander to lying, stealing, as well as every other crime, and when a venial Congress legalize the robbery of the poor and toiling millions, their apologies by prayer and psalm-singing for their wholesale iniquities, I do think that it is the duty of all honest men and women to assist the rising of the sun of righteousness. If there be any angels in heaven, surely now is the time for them to weep over the moral, social, religious and financial state of the Christian world. Loafing, idleness, pride and dishonesty in all the relations of life is now the rule, while industry, honor, integrity and common morality is the exception. Now, to adorn the above prosy facts, I will submit the following moral:

If the people would think, and all learn to know
Instead of priestcraft and fiction in place of the truth:
If Y. M. C. Associations were not gangs of knaves,
The hard toiling people would never be slaves.
All of our blessings proceed from the soil.
Secured by hard labor, by sweat and by toil:
The bankers, and loafers and Shylocks are a curse.
Yet the Rev. maw-worms are a hundred times worse.
No ship on the ocean would sail from these States,
Were it not for the farmer to furnish the freight:
No freight cars would run to bring Shylocks their meat,
If the farmers stopped raising the corn and the wheat:
The doctor and lawyer would starve with the bugs,
If the farmer renounced litigation and drugs.
We would have no need for prisons, were it not for preachers.
The Katlocks, Glendennings and thousands of Beechers.
But my letter and my moral is already too long.
And yet I've not hinted at half that is wrong.
Let bankers, and Shylocks and thieves feed the solution,
That the starving thousands can produce Revolution.

PRESS COMMENTS.

"One of the sharpest, most satirical poems ever brought before the American public. Logical, witty, and mirth-provoking. The subject of the rhymes is the great Woodhull-Tilton-Beecher scandal."

A rough, wide-awake Yankee, by the name of "Jonathan," a kind of a John Hay of a fellow, hauls all the characters over the coals in a sensible manner. There is more stern logic in his off-hand hits, than is often found in such rough-clad phraseology. The one who reads this pamphlet will never regret the investment."

Christianity and the Bible

AGAINST

Philosophy and Science.

DR. J. PILKINGTON, of California, has written a striking Pamphlet with the above title. A perusal of its mass of facts will better post and fortify the Liberal mind as to ecclesiastical pretensions, and the persecutions of the Church in all ages, than a more bulky and ambitious work. Liberal friend, no fitter work can be selected to hand to your bigoted neighbor of the Church than this instructive pamphlet. Anxious to spread the truth, we have reduced the price of this work, (which is elegantly printed in clear type, on fine white paper,) to twenty cents, postage 2 cents.

THE

HEATHENS OF THE HEATH.

BY WM. McDONNELL,
Author of "EXETER HALL."

THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH. "Rich in romantic and pathetic incident." It exhibits, with a terrible array of facts, the atrocities committed by the Christian Church at various times. It shows that "the purest morals existed without the Bible," and that many of the Heathen Philosophers were as great lovers of virtue as the characters named in the Bible. Shocking instances are given of the depravity of many Christian ministers, and of the prevailing inhumanity among Christian people. "The folly of Foreign Missions, while the heathen at home are neglected, is powerfully illustrated." "On the whole it is the work of a master hand." "A work of unaffected beauty," and its most valuable feature is, all positions are proved and authorities given.

Published by

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

500 pp. 12mo. In paper $1, postpaid; cloth $1 50.

EXETER HALL.

"Beautiful, tender, delicate, and pathetic in its appeals." "A truthful portraiture of the mischievous tendencies of religion." It is a "denial of the authority and inspiration of the Bible." It portrays the "development of the practical effects of religious fanaticism as seen in the family and in society." "Altogether it is the most scorching book ever published in America since the 'Age of Reason.'"

Paper, 60c.; Cloth, 80c.

These two great works should be in the library of every searcher after truth and every lover of mental liberty. The two in paper will be sent for $1 50; in cloth for $2 20.

Odds and Ends.

AN EPITAPH.

Put away those little breeches,
Do not try to mend the hole;
Little Johnny will not need them;
He has climbed the golden pole.

A GERMAN MOTHER at the West, taught her little son the prayers she had repeated in her own childhood. One day he surprised her by asking, "Ma, why do we always talk Yankee, and pray German? Is God a Dutchman?"

A SABBATH SCHOOL teacher in a country town, asked one of her scholars what animals Noah took into the Ark? To which she received the very prompt reply: "the leopard, the shepherd, the bob-tailed monkey and the bear."

QUESTION.—Which would be the greater loss to the world, the loss of its priests, or the loss of its dogs?

Answer.—The loss of its dogs; because the theological seminaries could make plenty more priests, but nobody could make a dog.

A MODEST ONE.—A little girl, after returning from church, where she saw a collection taken up for the first time, related what took place, and among other things, she said, with all her childish innocence, that "a man passed around a plate that had some money on it, but I didn't take any."

AT A SUNDAY-SCHOOL examination, the teacher asked a boy whether—after he had been standing and repeating—he could forgive those who had wronged him.

"Could you?" said the teacher, "forgive a boy, for example, who had insulted or struck you?"

"Y-e-s, sir," replied the lad, very slowly, "I think—I could, if he was bigger than I am."

FAIR PLAY.—At the moment, when, on the 14th of October, 1797, the British fleet under Admiral Duncan, and the Dutch fleet commanded by De Winter, were about to engage, two sailors, passing by Admiral Duncan's cabin, saw him on his knees.

"My eyes, Jack!" exclaimed one, "what is the Admiral about there?"

"Praying to heaven," replied the other.

"Praying for what?"

"That the Lord may give us victory."

"Well, now, that's a blasted shame. We are well able to lick them ourselves. Besides, give the beggars a chance."

THE SMACK IN SCHOOL.—The following incident in a District School, described many years ago by Mr. William Pitt Palmer, of New York, President of the Manhattan Insurance Company, in his address before "The Literary Society," in Stockbridge, Mass., his native home, will take many whose heads are now streaked with silvery hairs, a journey back to boyhood and early life:

A District School, not far away, Mid Berkshire hills, one Winter's day was humming with its wonted noise Of three-score mingled girls and boys—Some few upon their tasks intent, But more on furtive mischief bent; The while the Master's downward look Was fastened on a copy-book. When suddenly, behind his back, Rose sharp and clear a rousing SMACK! As 'twere a battery of bliss Let off in one tremendous kiss! "What's that?" the startled Master cries; "That thir," a little imp replies, "Wath William Willith, if you pleathe—I saw him kith Thuthanna Peathe!" With frown to make a statue thrill. The master thundered "Hither Will!" Like wretch o'ertaken in his track, With stolen chattels on his back, Will hung his head in fear and shame, And to the awful presence came—A great, green, bashful simpleton, The butt of all good natured fun; With smile suppressed, and birch up-raised,

The threatener faltered—"I'm amazed That you, my biggest pupil, should Beguilty of an act so rude! Before the whole set school to boot—

What evil genius put you to't?"

"'Twas she, herself, sir," sobbed the lad, I didn't mean to be so bad— But when Susannah shook her curls, And whispered I was 'fraid of girls, And durstn't kiss a baby's doll, I couldn't stand it, sir, at all! But up and kissed her on the spot, I knew—boo-hoo—I ought to not, But, somehow, from her looks—boo-hoo—I almost knew she wished me to."

A CONNUBIAL CONTROVERSY.—The bolt on the back door had needed replacing for a long time, but it was only the other night that Mr. Throcton had the presence of mind to buy a new one and take it home. After supper he hunted up his tools, removed the old bolt, and measured the location for the new one. He must bore some new holes, and Mrs. Throcton heard him roaming around the kitchen and woodshed, slamming doors, pulling out drawers, and kicking the furniture around. She went to the head of the stairs and called down:

"Richard, do you want anything?"

"Yes, I do!" he yelled back. "I want to know where in Texas that corkscrew is?"

"Corkscrew, Richard?"

"Yes, corkscrew, Richard! I've looked the house over and can't find it!"

"Why, we never had one, Richard!"

"Didn't, eh! We've had a dozen of 'em in the last two years, and I bought one not four weeks ago. It's always the way when I want anything."

"But you must be out of your head, husband," she said, as she descended the stairs, "We've kept house seven years, and I never remember of seeing you bring a corkscrew home."

"O, yes, I'm out of my head, I am!" he grumbled, as he pulled out the sewing machine drawer, and turned over its contents.

"I perhaps I'd better go to the lunatic asylum right away."

"Well, Richard, I know that I have never seen a corkscrew in this house."

"Then you are as blind as an owl in daylight, for I've bought five or six! The house is always upside down, anyhow, and I never can find anything!"

"The house is kept as well as any one of your folks can keep one!" she retorted, growing red in the face.

"I'd like my mother here to show you a few things," he said, as he stretched his neck to look on the high shelf in the pantry.

"Perhaps she'd boil her spectacles with the potatoes again!" answered the wife.

"Do you know who you are talking to?" he yelled, as he jumped down.

"Yes, I do!"

"Well, you'll be going to York State, if you don't look out!"

"I'd like to see myself! When I go this house goes!"

"Look out, Nancy!"

"I'm afraid of no man that lives, Richard Throcton!"

"I'll leave you!"

"And I'll laugh to see you go!"

Going close to her he extended his finger, shook it to emphasize his words, and slowly said:

"Nancy Throcton, I'll apply for a divorce to-morrow! I'll tell the judge that I kindly and lovingly asked you where the gimlet was, and you said we'd never had one in the house, which is a bold falsehood, as I can prove!"

"Gimlet!" she gasped.

"Yes, gimlet!"

"Why, I know where there are three or four. You said corkscrew!"

"Did I?" he gasped, sitting down on the corner of the table: "well, now, I believe I did!"

"And you went and abused me like a slave because I wouldn't say a gimlet was a corkscrew!" she sobbed, falling on the lounge.

"Nancy," he said tenderly lifting her up.

"Oh, Richard!" she chokingly answered.

"Nancy, I'll go right out doors and kill myself!"

"No, you needn't—I love you still! only—only—you know a gimlet is not a corkscrew!"

"It ain't—it ain't, Nancy; forgive me and let's be happy!"

And that household is so quietly happy that a canary bird would sing its head off if hung up in the hall.—Detroit Free Press.

As late as the 5th of November the flowers in the gardens of Santa Barbara, Cal., were of surpassing beauty. Among them were callas which measured 14 inches across, fuchsias covering houses with their plume-like branches, and passion flowers of various kinds, besides lemon and

A LITTLE girl five years of age, asked her mother if she knew Deacon Brown. "No, my child," was the reply. "you never saw him, he died before you were born." "Then, ma, if he went up before I came down, it may be we met on the way between."

When sassidge meat is phryin',
And hickory nuts is thick,
Ow, who would think of dyin'
Or even gettin' sick?

THE two negro murderers, Thompson and Weston, now confined in the Tombs, awaiting execution, were Methodists when they committed the crimes of which they are convicted, but have within the last few days become devout Catholics. They have been baptised by Father Barry and they expect to make a very brief call at the purgatory station and pass on directly to the "kingdom of glory."

THE EMBROIDLIO in the Hanson Place Baptist church, Brooklyn, has culminated in a deadly quarrel, which has severed the church into two hostile parties. Dr. Fulton has been forced to tender his resignation, and some sixty members retire with him to organize another society. The retiring party are praying God will set fire to Hanson Place church and burn it up. This will do no harm, if they do not undertake to help God a little in the business. Verily, how these Christians do love one another!

It was the night on which John Todd made his great speech to the colored population on Munjoy Hill. Capt. John Morrill from time to time awoke the echoes with his cannon. A man rushed up to him and said, "For God's sake don't fire any more." "Why not?" asked the astonished John. "There's a dead person lying in the next house," said he. "Well," said John, "if she's dead the noise won't hurt her, and the country must be saved." "Yes," groaned the man. "I know that, but she's my mother-in-law, and I've heard that guns will awake the dead."

A METHODIST preacher traveling in the back settlement of a Western State stopped at a cabin, where an old lady received him very kindly, giving him a warm supper, and asking many questions. "Stranger, where mought you be from?" "Madam, I reside in Shelby county, Kentucky." Well, stranger, hope no offence, but what mought you be doing out here?" "Madam, I am looking for the lost sheep of the tribe of Israel." "John," shouted the old lady, "here's a stranger all the way from Kentucky a hunting lost stock, and I'll just bet my life that old curly-haired black ram that came into our yard last week is one of hisen."

OLIVER Wendell Holmes years ago sent a letter to the post office of a ladies' fair at Pittsfield. On the first page he wrote:

Fair lady, whosoe'er thou art,
Turn this poor leaf with tenderest care,
And hush, oh, hush thy breathing heart—
The one thou lovest will be there."

On turning the "poor leaf" there was found a one dollar bill with some verses beginning:

"Fair lady, lift thine eyes and tell,
If this is not a truthful letter;
This is the one (1) thou lovest well,
And nought (0) can make thee love it better."

THERE is a Chinese priest in Pekin who is well nigh crazy to convert the heathen of America to the true Asiatic religion of Buddha. Every time the Emperor takes an airing, this benevolent Buddhite throws himself flat before his majesty and shouts: "The heathen, sirs, the heathen in America, send me over to convert their souls!" The imperial body guards in vain try to bottle up his zeal, and he has become a tolerated curiosity in the streets. That priest was at least as sensible as thousands of our own, who are so anxious to send our religion to the antipodes. Probably our people might be benefitted by an infusion of Chinese morality.

WARREN, a little five-year-old in a neighboring town, whose mother is in the daily habit of reading the Bible to him, asked of a young lady visitor, "Who do you love best in the Bible?" The visitor replied: "God, don't you?" "No!" said Warren; "I love Noah best." "Why?" "Because he built a ship." After a pause he continued: "I toll you what I mean to do; I'm going to get a cannon and fire it off, and make a hole in the clouds and ask God to let Noah down by a string." The same night Warren was severely attacked with croup. The visitor was in the sick chamber, sympathizing with her little friend, when he looked up at her, and in an almost inaudible voice, from the hoarse throat of croup, he said: "I tell you what, if this thing keeps up, I guess I'll go up to Noah, instead of his coming down to me." Cute for five.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH MATTERS are still ripening; several examinations and councils are on the tapis. Brother Henry Ward is supposed to be feeling a trifle uneasy. We cannot help pitying him; that he should strive so hard and assume so much boldness to cover his iniquity, and so fail at last. He has been compelled to abandon the "policy of silence," and the facts are bound to come out. The daily papers of this city are calling upon him to abandon the pulpit, and to cease his desecration of that sacred institution. This he must ultimately do. Mrs. Moulton's recent letter to Plymouth Church was a remarkable one, and read like the statements of an honest, truthful person. It carries conviction with it. Deacon West is a sore trouble to Plymouth; they would gladly be rid of him, but they cannot shake him off till an examination is had.

THE Sun, in a full and scathing review of the Fourth Volume of the Rev. Mr. Talmage's Sermons, says: "Like the three volumes which have preceded it, it is distinguished for the lack of intelligence, for the egotism, and for the disregard of truth which are exhibited in its pages. Mr. Talmage seems to have a spite against the Scriptures and a grievance against the English language, and he permits no opportunity for wroaking his vengeance upon either the word of God or his mother tongue to pass unimproved. His perversion of Scripture are always irreverent and sometimes blasphemous. He habitually mis-quotes, distorts and caricatures the sacred text." This Reverend harlequin is doubtless one of the greatest "blatherskites" now extant. If one could be induced to believe that God Almighty employs such fellows as Talmage to attend to his business, he would readily conclude that he himself needs a guardian as one non compos mentis.

THE Brahmo Somaj sect of India apparently consider that though intoxication is a vice to be avoided, yet in a spiritual point of view it is very commendable. The following curious "devotional" is published in a Brahmo paper: "I have tasted, Father dear, the wine of sweet communion, which, day after day, thou hast poured into my heart during my morning prayers, and I feel extremely happy. But such wine no longer suits the advanced stage of devotion to which thou hast brought me, and my heart naturally craves stronger drink. From thy inexhaustible storehouse do thou graciously supply me with such nectar of love and joy as may keep my soul under its inebriating influences all day and night. Experience has convinced me that there is far more real happiness in spiritual intoxication than in all the pleasures of the world put together. Therefore I humbly pray unto thee, O Father, vouchsafe unto me far more inebriating communion than I have yet tasted."

ADDRESS ON THE Anniversary of the Birth of Thomas Paine.

BY C. A. CODMAN.

BRENTWOOD, N. Y. Jan. 29th, 1875.

FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS: The anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, which we have met to-night to celebrate, seems a fitting occasion to review the pathway we have gone over, and see from our present stand-point, how much, if any, progress we have made, and what encouragement we may draw from the retrospect.

The race grows slowly, but at accelerated speed; notably so, during the last three-quarters of the century we have now to consider.

Let us go back in our memory, to the period that gave birth to "Paine's Age of Reason," which we know was written in the prison of the Conciergerie, during the Reign of Terror, and under the very shadow of death, its completion liable at any moment to be interrupted by the execution of the National Assembly's sentence, "Death by the Guillotine;" which fate Paine escaped by the merest chance.

The French nation was in an anarchy of social and political excitement, unequalled in modern history. The doctrines of Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, D'Holbach and the school of the Encyclopædists were being put to the test of practice.

Then geology was unknown. In its place were a few wild and unsubstantial theories without verification. During this time, geology has gained a solid footing, adding greatly to the stores of knowledge. It has shown that death was in the world, ages before man, forever upsetting the theological idea, that it was sent as a punishment for sins committed in the garden of Eden. It has overthrown the Mosaic chronology, and shown that the Jewish record covers, as it were, but a moment of time, compared to the countless ages it has taken to produce the many changes seen in the earth's crust—has exploded the traditions of the deluge of Noah by showing that similar great submerges have occurred many times in the world's history, and may occur again; has exposed the utter unreliability of the Bible account of creation, and thus struck another deadly blow at so-called revelation, wringing from a Christian divine, the acknowledgement, that the first four chapters of Genesis must be looked upon as an Eastern allegory, and finally, it has demonstrated that the same causes which have in the past wrought great crises, are in operation to-day. And the "Age of Reason" was being brought forward with all the fiery energy of the long oppressed French nation.

Exasperated by ages of tyranny and spoliation; intoxicated with their newly found liberty, and filled with ardent enthusiasm for the Republic, there is little wonder that liberty ran to license and intolerance, and reason to madness.

Carlisle says, "all France was in a wild paroxysm which only human blood would appease." But in this wild tempest, was struck a fatal blow at the divine right of kings, which, up to that time, had been the unquestioned law of the world, and from which blow it has not, and probably never will, recover.

But a few months previous, the science of chemistry was born, by the discovery, by Priestly, of oxygen gas, which was the basis of a real chemistry, for all before this, was but little more than alchemy, but here was possible a real knowledge of the constitution of this world. From this discovery, the science has advanced, step by step, to the re-discovery of the great fundamental law of the Universe, the correlation of force. Coincident with this, came the invention of the spectroscope which shows us, that not only our planetary system, but the far off stars, are substantially, of the same matter as our own globe, and this demonstrates the unity of the Universe, and that these crises are the results of natural causes, and not from the caprice or revenge of a supernatural God.

Out of this study of nature has grown the conviction that man has ascended from the lower animals; that instead of being created by the Jehovah in his form and image, and fashioned by his hand from clay, it is now shown that he is related to all that have lived before him, linking him to all the past; that he is the product of all the ages, instead of being an especial creation of some short-sighted deity who soon cursed and regretted his handiwork. By this knowledge another shock has been given to revelation, which has lost ground it can never regain. Oken, Lamarck, and Darwin deserve the hearty commemoration of their fellow men, for the flood of light they have thrown on this subject and their labors. Darwin is an instance of what effect a single career may have on the destinies of man. During this period have been made the researches of Gall and Spurzheim on the organization and functions of the human brain, demonstrating that man acts according to his organization and surroundings, in virtue of the laws of his being, and of necessity; and thus is forever thrust out the assumption of the freedom of the will which has rested on man as an incubus, and been in the hands of priests the prolific means of domination and tyranny.

Philosophy has also made great advances in these years, and has come to realize the comparative futility of the deductive method in the solution of problems, and now recognizes that its path to success lies in the inductive method. It has mostly laid aside its facts of consciousness and has learned that its true course is to study phenomena, and from their examination discover the governing laws. It has left its beaten track, trodden for thousands of years, finding the methods of the past barren of results; it has left off building from the top downward, and gains its proof from the opposite method. From this great change of base we look for splendid results, and may feel the highest encouragement in this direction, for see how great has been the achievements of the scientists since they laid aside their a priori methods, and have gone to Nature and the laboratory to examine for themselves, to question the constitution of things, to analyze and combine, to test and weigh, and thus to get knowledge instead of theories.

See what practical applications have been made, by these means adding to man's comfort. Steam, as a motor, is working vast changes in the conditions of society, bringing man in contact with his fellows, eliminating national prejudices, and enabling him to realize that we are really brothers of one family, and thus ameliorating distinctions of race and belief.

The telegraph brings the events of the world to our breakfast table, the printing press gives us the mental stores of the past, and the last thought of the day for our enlightenment and consideration, and even the wind and the weather are predicted with almost absolute certainty.

These growing means are great social factors, all bearing on the human problem, the significance of which we can hardly realize. Men and things are being studied critically and profoundly, and the old foundations are now under trial as in a fiery furnace, and the time is not far distant when all men will ask for demonstration, and be led no more by dogmas assumed by the artful and designing or the ignorant and bigoted.

I think the crowning discovery of the period is, that of the Human God—the Supreme Being, Humanity—which is sure to supplant the supernatural Almighty, with his caprices and revenge, and replace that infantile conception with a rational object of worship, worthy of man's highest devotion.

If Comte had done nothing more than this, he would deserve to be enrolled in the front rank of the world's benefactors. But he has also shown that wealth, being the product of all, must have a social destination—a principle of immense importance in the present struggle between capital and labor, of which, as yet, we have had only the preliminary skirmishes.

Such are some of the results that have been reached in the last eighty years, and they are so grand and far reaching in the field of thought and action which they cover, so potent for good, that man may well take heart, even amid the toilsome struggles of to-day, and be filled with enthusiastic aspirations for the coming era of Brotherhood and Unity, for anticipating which, we as Socialists have been looked upon as fools and dreamers. But time brings its revenges, and not many generations shall pass before the organization of society will bring peace and plenty, in place of strife, starvation and misery, with which the world is filled.

Another source of encouragement is to be found in the growing unbelief in Supernaturalism; in the lessening hold of the priests and clergy on the people—notably so among the Protestants, which is shown by the increasing disrespect shown the clergy, and from the great number of scandals that have of late years come to light, as well as from increased enlightenment. The clergy realize that their grasp is growing weaker, and make great efforts to retain the connection, and it is quite the rule for them to come to the people in various ways—by the modification of doctrine, by the recognition somewhat of Science, by entertainments and amusements not long since looked upon as ungodly. Who now hears of infant damnation, literal hell, or resurrection of the body? These are relegated to the past, and in their place transcendental explanations of the nature of the Deity, of God as the soft shadow; of the Holy Ghost as a thin film, of hell as a condition of the conscience; and other important though important modifications of dogmas that, until now, have had their hold for ages. The Church realizes the gravity of the situation, and sees that the coming struggle involves the very existence of the Almighty. On the other hand, the Church of Rome insists on an even farther claim on its followers, and in its pretensions to infallibility, its dogmas of the immaculate conception; and its anathemas against modern science and its tendencies; it shows itself thoroughly reactionary, and must, before long, entirely forfeit its claim as a real spiritual power; for science is illuminating the world; and as knowledge increases so fades away the gloom of the dark ages. As the more we know, the less we believe. Fiction is replaced by facts, dogmas by natural law, and the fancies of the imagination, instead of being accepted as truths, take their proper place in the domain of poetry.

To my mind, there are three problems of importance now standing in the way of progress, and pressing for solution, viz; The theological, (God, Heaven, and Immortality), the relation of sexes, and the relation of capital and labor. And they are all on trial; substantial ghosts, that will not down, until they are settled beyond peradventure. The growing demand for justice in all the relations of life, is leading on to daylight in these matters. Science and philosophy will seal the fate of theology; the study of history and a knowledge of the laws of the human organism will solve the sexual problem, and the organization of industry will harmonize capital and labor; and when these are settled, this life will be worth the living, and no longer a vale of tears, in which death is welcome. To this consummation have tended the efforts of all good men; to this end the instincts of the race point. This is the meaning of history; to this we are rapidly converging. Human unity becomes the central point, toward which, the race is traveling.

And as we see clearly the destiny of man, the objective aim that, tho' never so blindly through toil and struggle man's instincts have led him through blood and sacrifice. Let us gather up the names of those mighty men who have contributed to bring the era of knowledge and justice; let us carve them high on the fair temple of humanity, let us bring all the arts to their glorification, and, through sculpture, painting, and poesy, hold their careers up for imitation and emulation; re-people our Parthenon with Phidias, Pericles, Ptolemy and Pythagoras from classic Greece; bring from the East, Confucius, Zoroaster and Buddha, with Moses, Christ, and Mahomet. Let Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe represent poetry; Aristotle, Bacon, Mill and Comte stand for philosophy; Newton, Kepler, LaPlace, Huxley and Tyndall for modern science; and, also, let us place Voltaire, Hume, Rousseau and (the man in whose name we have met tonight), Thomas Paine, among this glorious company, as having been levers in the liberation of man; instruments, in their ages, of the mighty instincts, the great gulf stream of human tendencies, flowing through the ocean of time.

With these, and all others worthy of working for humanity, we will beautify our memorial halls, and may man be glorified in his conquests over ignorance, and happy in that realization, for which, he has ever yearned.

Restored from oblivion, cleared of calumnies and recognized at its true worth, will be found the name of Thomas Paine, the patriot, statesman, and philosopher.

Spencer, Huxley, and Cairnes, on Social Evolution.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 15th, I referred to three classes of thinkers on the question of Social Progress, but I shall not comment on those thinkers (the Degradationists) who maintain that the condition of man was originally perfect and has become one of hopeless degradation "until some great man restore us," although there are among them men, (other than those whom Dr. Marvin calls the rank and file of humanity, the insane, the followers of Moody and Sankey, and Robert Dale Owen,) men eminent in science, as for instance Hugh Miller. I confine my remarks to those thinkers, (the Progressionists), who assume that each stage of progress is upward, and is the outcome of the preceding stage; and that the series of stages, from the most savage to the most civilized, are a connected series of sequences.

Prof. Cairnes, in his article, "Mr. Spencer on Social Evolution," said of the thinkers who believe that man was originally a savage, and that the condition of society is one of progress and improvement, that, though Spencer and Huxley agree with Comte and Draper in the assumption that the progress of society has been, and will be, one of continuous improvement, that they disagree as to the method of demonstrating the truth of the assumption; and that Spencer and Huxley disagree as to the method of aiding progress in the future. As the dissident points in the sociology of the above named representatives of modern science are so great, I think that our anti-Christian writers and lecturers, who advocate true as well as free thought, should discriminate, and not link those representatives together so as to lead their readers and hearers to infer that the principles of their sociology are in perfect accord.

First, as to Huxley and Spencer; it is now five years since the former, in an article on "Administration Nihilism," said that, on the question of aiding progress in the future, he diverged widely from Spencer, who holds that the duty of a State is simply that of a policeman; that its duty is not to promote good or prevent evil, except so far as to enforce contracts, and inflict penalties on those who have been guilty of obvious and tangible assaults on persons and property; and that whatever government does beyond this is sure to be done badly, and worse than if done by private enterprise.

Spencer complained that Huxley misalled and misrepresented his (Spencer's) doctrine of "Negatively Regulated Control." Huxley's only rejoinder was that he had not done either, and that Spencer's reply, though argumentative and vigorous, may be repulsed. Cairnes shows that it may, and that Huxley's charge that Spencer advocates that laissez faire (let alone) should be "lord of all" in the State is justified by the concluding pages of Spencer's recent work, "Study of Sociology." Spencer affirms that the future of the human race depends on the action of motives of a private and personal kind, such as operate in the production of wealth; and that "the process of Social Evolution is, in its general character, so far pre-determined that its successive stages cannot be antedated, and that hence no teaching or policy can advance it beyond a certain normal rate, which is limited by the rate of organic modification in organic human beings; yet it is quite possible to perturb, or retard or disorder the process." He says, "there cannot be more good done than that of letting social progress go on unhindered;" whereas, "an immensity of mischief may be done * * * by policies carried out in pursuit of erroneous conceptions." This general conclusion Spencer says may be discouraging. "Probably the more enthusiastic, hopeful of great amelioration in the state of mankind to be brought about by propagating this belief or initiating that reform, will feel that a doctrine negating their sanguine expectations takes away much of the stimulus to exertion. If large advances in human welfare can come only in the slow process of things, which will inevitably bring them, why should we trouble ourselves?"

Cairnes says that Spencer's answer to this very natural question is simply this, that on visionary hopes rational criticisms cannot but have a depressing influence, but "it is better to recognize the truth;" and Cairnes says, there cannot be any doubt as to the paralyzing effects of Spencer's teachings on laborers in the field of human welfare. He contrasts Mill's philosophy with that of Spencer, and says that Mill teaches that social progress rests with the individual men and women of each generation, who, within the range of their influence, make or mar human welfare; and that political institutions help or hinder human advance according as they are suited to the requirements of the time. He says that Mill warns us against such a calamitous delusion as Mr. Spencer's optimistic faith, and maintains "that there is an incessant and everflowing current of human affairs towards the worse, consisting of all the follies, vices, negligences, indolences and supinenesses of mankind; which is controlled and kept from sweeping all before it, by the exertions which some persons constantly, and others by fits, put forth in the direction of good and worthy objects. It gives a very insufficient idea of the importance of the strivings which take place to improve and elevate human nature and life, to suppose that their chief value consists in the amount of the actual improvement realized by their means, and that the consequences of their cessation would merely be that we should remain as we are. A very small diminution of those exertions would not only put a stop to improvement, but would turn the general tendency of things towards deterioration, which, once begun, would proceed with increasing rapidity, and become more difficult to check, until it reached a state often seen in history, and in which so many large portions of mankind even now grovel."

Cairnes says that evolution is a law of social existence, and that it depends on the efforts of those who are concerned in the issue whether it shall be toward improvement or deterioration. According to Spencer the future of the human race may be safely trusted to the action of motives of a private or personal kind. According to Mill social progress needs the support of other and higher aims to keep it in its path, so that if mankind or some moderate portion of them do not rise to the level of higher aims, and will not by strenuous and persistent efforts labor for social good, "scorning delights and living laborious days," retrogression is certain and inevitable. This, says Cairnes is the nature of the issue upon which the students of social science are called to exercise their judgment.

It is nearly five years since this issue was raised by Huxley. Spencer's reply to Huxley was published in the Fortnightly Review; Cairnes, rejoinder to Spencer's reply appeared in the same Review, in Jan. 1873, and was republished in the Index for July. This issue has not been noticed by the conductors of our Liberal journals, and the only notice of the rejoinder has been in the Index, and that merely refers to a statement that Mill was one of those who set the highest value on Cairnes intellectual powers. The question is of importance in relation to the respective influence of the philosophers cited.

Huxley argues that Spencer's principle, logically considered, extends to much more than the functions assigned to it by Spencer. Huxley says, if the function of a State is limited to not allowing one man to interfere with the liberty of another, it is a logical consequence that the State ought to compel my neighbor to clean his drains, and not poison the atmosphere which I breathe at the risk of typhus fever; and to vaccinate his children; and should compel him not to bring them up untaught and untrained to earn a living; and also not to leave strychnine lozenges in the way of my children. In these cases my neighbor restricts my freedom just as much as if he threatened my life with a pistol; and robs me by increasing my burden of taxation for jails and work-houses.

JOHN CHAPPELSMITH.

New Harmony, Ind., Oct. 28, 1875.

"AUNT, did God make that man?" whispered a little four-year old to his companion, in the Jamaica Plain horse cars, as he looked askance at Mr. Wah Lee, one of the new laundrymen from the flowery kingdom, who sat opposite. "Certainly, my dear," was the reply; "and why do you ask such a question?" "Because, aunty, he didn't make the hinges to his eyes on straight,"

Man Not Degenerating.

The Modern Egyptian as Big as the Egyptian of thousands of years ago—The Modern Englishman Bigger than his Ancestors.

There never was a delusion with less evidence for it, except a permanent impression among mankind, which is often the result, not of accumulated experience, but of an ever-renewing discontent with the actual state of things. There is not the slightest evidence anywhere that man was ever bigger, stronger, swifter, or more enduring under the same conditions of food and climate than he is now.

As to the bigness, the evidence is positive. Modern Egyptians are as big as the mummies who were conquerors in their day, and modern Englishmen are bigger. There are not in existence a thousand coats of armor which an English regiment could put on. Very few moderns can use ancient swords, because the hilts are too small for their hands. Endless wealth and skill were expended in picking gladiators, and there is no evidence that a man among them was as big or as strong as Shaw. No skeleton, no statue, no picture, indicates that men in general were ever bigger. The Jews of to-day are as large as they were in Egypt, or larger. The people of the Romagna have all the bearing and more than the size of the Roman soldiery. No feat is recorded as usual with Greek athletes which English acrobats could not perform now.

There is no naked savage tribe which naked Cornishmen or Yorkshiremen could not strangle. No race exists of which a thousand men similarly armed would defeat an English, or German, or Russian regiment of equal numbers. Nothing is recorded of our forefathers here in England which Englishmen could not do, unless it be some feats of archery, which were the result of a long training of the eye continued for generations. The most civilized and luxurious family that ever existed, the European royal caste, is physically as big, as healthy, and as powerful as any people of whom we have any account that science can accept. Thiers' Frenchman is Cæsar's Gaul in all bodily conditions, and with an increased power of keeping alive, which may be partly owing to improved conditions of living, but is probably owing still more to developed vitality. There is no evidence that even the feeble races are feebler than they became after their first acclimatization.

The Bengalee was what we know him twelve hundred years ago, and the Chinaman was represented on porcelain just as he is now before the birth of Christ. No race ever multiplied like the Anglo-Saxon, which has had no advantage of climate, and till lately no particular advantage of food. Physical status depends on physical conditions, and why should a race better fed, better clothed, and better housed than it ever was before degenerate? Because it eats corn instead of berries? Compare the Californian and the Digger Indian. Because it wears clothes? The wearing of clothes, if burdensome—which the experience of army doctors in India as to the best costume for marching makes excessively doubtful, they declaring unanimously that breechless men suffer from varicose veins, as men wearing trousers do not—must operate as a permanent physical training. You carry weight habitually. Because they keep indoors? Compare English professionals with Tasmanian savages, living in identically the same climate, but living out of doors.

The conditions of civilization not only do not prohibit Capt. Webb, who would have outwalked, outswum, or strangled any German that Tacitus ever romanced about, but they enable him to live to seventy instead of dying at forty-five, as two thousand years ago he, then probably a slave bred for the arena, would have done.

That the human race, even under the best conditions, advances very little in physical capacities is true, but then it is true also that those conditions are fatal to the most powerful of the old improving forces, the survival of the fittest. Still an advance is perceptible in vital power, and we question whether a Greek swimmer would ever have crossed from Dover to Calais, just as strongly as we question whether the ancient world ever possessed a horse which would have achieved a place at Epsom. Why should men grow feeble in civilization any more than horses?—London Spectator.

"Safest to Believe."

It has often been argued that credulity is safer than scepticism—that "it is safest to believe;" inasmuch as if a man believes in heaven and hell, and there be no such places, he is, if no gainer, at least no loser; whereas the Infidel may lose, and cannot gain. Upon the same principle, it were safest to believe all the religions of the world at once—Christian, Mohammedan, Jewish, Hindoo, Confucian, and all the rest; because it is but insuring the matter by halves to trust to one only. If Allah be not the only God, and Mahomet be an imposter, there is no harm done and nothing lost; and if there be not a paradise in another world, there has been a pleasant dream of anticipated joys in this.

Let us ask, is the balance of profit and loss fairly struck? Are the chances all in favor of the religion-ist, and all against the sceptic? Is there nothing to be thrown into the opposite scale? Surely much. If religion be a fallacy, it is a fallacy pregnant with mischief. It excites the fears without foundation; it fosters feelings of separation between the believer and the unbeliever; it consumes valuable time that can never be recalled, and valuable talents that ought to be better employed; it draws money from our pockets to support a deception; it teaches the elect to look upon their fellow men as heathens and castaways, living in sin here, and doomed to perdition hereafter; it awakens harassing doubts, gloomy despondency, and fitful melancholy; it turns our thoughts from the things of the world, where alone true knowledge is found; it speaks of temporal misery and temporal pleasures as less than nothing and vanity, and thus fosters indifference to the causes of the weal and woe of mankind; worse than all, it chains us down to an antiquated orthodoxy, and forbids the free discussion of those very subjects which it most concerns us to discuss. If religion be a fallacy, its votaries are slaves. Whereupon, then, rests the assertion, that if the religionist does not gain, he cannot lose? Is it nothing to lose time and talents, to waste our labor on that which is not bread, and our money upon that which profiteth not? Is it nothing to feel that the human beings that surround us are children of the devil, heirs of hell, sons of perdition? Is it nothing to think that we may perhaps look across the great gulf and see some one we have loved on earth tormented in a fiery lake; and hear him ask us to dip a finger in water that it may cool his parched tongue? Is it no loss to live in disquiet by day, and in fear by night; to pass through dark seasons of doubt and temptation, and to be conscious that we are but as strangers and pilgrims here, toiling through a weary valley of cares and sorrows? Is it no loss to hold back when truth oversteps the line of orthodoxy, and when there ought to be free discussion, to shrink before we know not what? Is all this no loss? Or, is it not rather the loss of all that a free and rational being most values?

Those engaged in the trade of religion, imagine themselves to have a mighty advantage against Infidels upon the strength of the old, worn-out argument that whether the Christian religion be true or false there can be no harm in believing; and that belief is, at any rate, the safer side. Now to say nothing of this old popish argument, which a sensible man must see is the very essence of popery, and would oblige us to believe all the absurdities and nonsense in the world: inasmuch as if there be no harm in believing, and there be some harm and danger in not believing, the more we believe, the better; and all the argument for any religion whatever would be, that it should frighten us out of our wits; the more terrible, the more true; and it would be our duty to become the converts of that religion, whatever it might be, whose priests could swear the loudest, and damn and curse the fiercest. This is a wolfish argument in sheep's clothing.

Sovereigns of Industry.

New York city, which like the State, is slow to avail itself of the benefits conferred by this Order, has at last a council established, which we understand, is in a flourishing condition, and is already enabling its members to purchase many of the necessities of life at considerably reduced rates. The leaders in this council are hard, earnest workers, who believe in co-operation, and are determined that "Earl" Council shall be an honor to the President of the National Council, for whom they here named it. Though the Order has been instituted primarily and principally for the purpose of co-operative buying and selling, or bringing the producer and consumer more immediately together, thus doing away with the services and profits of the "middle-men;" yet this council do not by any means intend to confine themselves to this purpose merely, but to make their weekly gatherings entertaining and instructive by the discussion of various subjects pertaining to the welfare and progress of mankind. The intellect, ability, and earnestness among its members are an earnest of its success in this direction. We advise our liberal friends to learn more of this organization, and if satisfied of its utility to lend a helping hand. M.

GOD'S VICEGERENTS.—John Allberger, in his "Monks and Popes," says: "Of the two hundred and ninety-seven Popes who have filled the papal chair; twenty-four were anti-popes; twenty-six were deposed; nineteen were compelled to abandon Rome; twenty-eight were kept on the papal throne by foreign intervention; fifty-four were obliged to rule over foreign parts; sixty-four died by violence; eighteen were poisoned; one was strangled; one was smothered; one died by having nails driven into his temples; one by a noose around his neck; and only one hundred and fifty-three out of the whole number proved themselves at all worthy men."

Two thousand oystermen, working one thousand vessels, of various kinds, are harvesting the oyster crop near this city. They estimate the crop at two million bushels, which will return a profit of six or seven hundred thousand dollars.

DANIEL IN THE LIONS' DEN.

Among the many extravagant and improbable stories with which the Bible abounds, few are more extraordinary and incredible than those related in the book called Daniel. Who the author of the book was, cannot be known. It purports to have been written by Daniel, who lived over six hundred years before Christ; but it is thought by Bible critics that portions of the book were written in the time of the Maccabees, less than two hundred years before Christ; but it is not very material how this was. It is a book of wonderful stories and remarkable dreams—which entitles it to rank with the last book in the Bible, called "Revelations"—which reads like the ravings of a mad man, and which none but an insane person can understand.

The dreams of Daniel about the beasts that rose up out of the water, the horns that grew and extended to the host of heaven and pulling down some of the host thereof, (probably meaning the stars, and it must have been a long horn, and a strong one to reach so far and do such execution); his dreams of images, etc., etc., have been a great puzzle to divines for centuries. Scores of times have these sage divines, by counting the "horns," the "images," the "times," and the "weeks," mentioned in Daniel, been able to predict to a day and an hour, when the day of "eternal smash" was to come, and the end of all sublunary things take place. Oft and oft again, within the last forty years, have the saints had their ascension robes made, and held themselves in readiness to "go up" at the sound of the trumpet, to meet their Savior in the air; but as often have they been disappointed; for in every case has the final day of all things been postponed, and the wise heads have returned to the book of Daniel to more carefully count the weeks, the times and the horns, to fix another date in the near future, when the awful day should surely come—when the end of time would certainly arrive.

Within a few months, even, the last great disappointment in this line occurred; the Lord failed to put in an appearance, and the saints were under the painful necessity of again laying away their ascension robes, while the knowing ones and the interpreters of dreams and visions had again to overhaul their spiritual arithmetic and make a new calculation as to just when the dread day shall surely come. Whether another day is positively set for the "Son of Man" to appear in the clouds, when all the faithful will ascend to meet him, is more than we can say. If it has not been, it doubtless will be, again to disappoint the ardent expectations of credulous dupes. Although many have said in year past that if the final day did not come at a certain date in the near future, that they would no longer have faith or confidence in the word of God, yet, when the day passed, and nothing unusual happened, they again turned to their Bibles as fondly as ever, to count the horns of the beasts, to estimate the weeks, and times, and half-times, to solve this time with unerring certainty the great mysteries of God. It is one of the curiosities of poor human nature to observe what simpletons and fools men and women can make of themselves in matters of religion and faith in that old book, and what importance they attach to dreams and meaningless visions.

Daniel seems to have left Judea in the reign of King Jehoiakim, when he was quite a youth, at the time his nation was taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, and carried to Babylon, and with three other Hebrew children seemed to be taken into special favor by the king in their new home. His name was changed from Daniel to Belteshazzar at the time the names of his companions were also changed; it was decided they should be taught the literature of the Chaldeans and to be fed three years upon the same quality of meat and wine of which the king partook. doubtless, upon the supposition that this kind of diet would contribute to their physical and mental growth. The four young men, however, it seems decided not to eat the meat and drink the wine of the king but to use a diet of pulse and water, which probably was much like our bean-porridge—a good enough dish, now and then; but perhaps hardly the thing for a steady diet. They, however, seemed to flourish finely upon it, for at the end of ten days they were looking more plump and healthy than any of the other children who lived upon the king's prescribed diet, and they were allowed to have their own way in the matter of food.

It seems by the narrative that Nebuchadnezzar had a remarkable dream, so remarkable, in fact, that he could not remember a word of it. He, however, called all his magicians and wise men together to tell him what his dream was which he had forgotten. The king was so unreasonable as to threaten them all with death if they did not tell him what he had dreamed. It was in vain that they remonstrated with him, and told him it was an unreasonable demand which no living person could comply with, for he still insisted upon the terms being carried out which he had laid down. Had not Daniel come forward and announced to the king that he could declare unto him, not only his dream, but the interpretation also, there is no telling how many of these poor magicians would have been executed. After four days of thought and labor, upon the strength of the bean-porridge diet, Daniel—if we are to believe the story—told the king what he had dreamed, which was about a great image, with a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of brass, and legs and feet of iron and clay. Whether this was precisely the dream which "old Neb" had dreamed, nobody knows, and perhaps he did not know himself, but inasmuch as the young man boldly declared it to him and said with confidence, it was the dream, the old king seemed to be satisfied, and after hearing the interpretation, he conferred great honors upon Daniel, giving him fine presents and making a great man of him.

It might be supposed such a mark of divine power as Nebuchadnezzar had received, would have converted him to the true faith, and made him a worshiper of the God of the Jews, but not so, for in the very next chapter we are told about his erecting an image of gold, sixty cubits, or one hundred and ten feet high—the most valuable god of which any mention is made in sacred or profane history, and one which, must be supposed, would seriously tax all the gold mines in the world. At this time, when we have the gold mines of California, Nevada, Australia and South America, which at that time were unknown, would, combined, find it to be no easy matter to turn out gold enough in a year to make a god over one hundred feet in height and eleven feet across.

Nebuchadnezzar commanded that every person in his kingdom should bow down to this golden god, which all seemed to do readily enough, save Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; and for refusing to do so, they were thrown into a fiery furnace heated expressly for the occasion and made seven times hotter than usual, with not the slightest harm, however, to the three young men, thrown bound into the seething fire, but sudden death to the strong man who threw them in. As all who did not bow down to the image were thrown into the furnace, and as Daniel was not thrown in; we are to infer that he bowed down to the image. If he did not, he surely was unlike the great bulk of his race, who have ever proved themselves to cherish a warm and devoted admiration for gold.

Ten years after this, and thirty-three years from the date of Nebuchadnezzar's first dream, behold, he had another dream which troubled him greatly. This time his dream was about a tall tree which reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the ends of the earth. (Where the ends of the earth are located, is not told us). Daniel was again called upon to interpret this dream, which he easily did, which was, that Nebuchadnezzar should be driven from the habitation of men, to dwell with the beasts of the field and to eat grass like an ox; and "seven times" were to pass over, before he should return, when he should become aware that the Most High ruled in heaven.

The king murmured at this remarkable prophecy or decree, as well he might, but there was no mercy nor pity for him. That self-same hour he was driven forth from the sons of men, and he abode in the fields; he was wet with the dews of heaven, and he ate grass, sure enough, like an ox. It is not known to this day how long "seven times" was, that the old king was thus debarred from the society of men; but at all events it was long enough for his hair to grow out like eagle's feathers, and his nails like bird's claws. When, it is intimated, he was restored to his throne and his kingdom, though but little is afterwards said about him.

The story is a very extraordinary one, to say the least. The stomach and digestive apparatus of the human race is differently constituted, from the bovine class of animals, and is very illy calculated for subsisting upon grass, and it is very difficult to understand how a man could live upon grass, and how his hair could become like eagle's feathers.

It is singular, also, that the Chaldeans, who were among the most enlightened nations of that age of the world, should allow their king to stray into the fields and live there like an ox. If he became demented or insane, they doubtless would have taken better care of him than that. It is very remarkable, too, if such an occurrence ever did take place with one of their great kings, that their histories should contain no mention of it, and that no body in the world should ever have mentioned it, save the author of the book of Daniel. It should be taken as truth, with many grains of allowance.

When Belshazzar succeeded to the throne of Babylon, after his father had "gone to grass," he seemed to go in for having a good time, and got up a great feast, at which a thousand guests attended. In the midst of the hilarity, however, an event took place which produced a sudden damper upon the king's rejoicing. A hand became visible, and wrote four words—"Mene, mene, tekel upharsin"—upon the wall of the festival room, and none of the astrologists and sooth-sayers could interpret the meaning of the ominous words; but when, at the suggestion of the queen, Daniel was called for, he soon unravelled the mystery, and read it off forthwith. It meant that the days of the kingdom were numbered; that the king was weighed in the balance and found wanting; and that the kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. It was like a "word and blow," for "in that night was Belshazzar slain."

Darius was the next ruler in the country and Daniel succeeded in securing his good will and in obtaining office under him, as he had with his predecessors. Daniel was a very prayerful individual and he prayed regularly at stated times; but his enemies induced Darius to sign a royal decree that whoever should ask any petition of God or man for thirty days, save of the king, he should be cast into the den of lions. This made no difference with our good Daniel, and he kept on praying every day as was his wont. When this intelligence was brought to the ears of the king he was very sorrowful, for Daniel was a favorite of his, but as the laws of the Medes and Persians could not be changed he caused Daniel to be thrown into the den of lions. It is probable these were not wild lions, roaming the forests, for they do not, in a state of nature, congregate in "dens." The "den" was probably a cage where lions, more or less tamed, were kept, either for exhibition or other purposes, something as Van Amburgh, Barnum and other men have done in our time.

Within the last thirty years it has been a very common thing for some one connected with a menagerie to enter the lions' cage in course of the performance, and go through various exercises. If the lions are well fed and under a good degree of training, they seldom have offered to do any injury to those who have thus entered their cages. Some persons, doubtless by their superior magnetic powers, are able to control, to a great extent, animals, as well as men. Van Amburgh, doubtless, possessed this peculiarity in his intercourse with lions, as Rarey did with the horse. Is it not improbable that Daniel also possessed similar characteristics? If, however, the lions had just been fed and their bellies were full, and an old man like Daniel—for he then had got to be about eighty years of age, and probably somewhat shrivelled and dried up, it is quite possible the beasts would voluntarily let him alone, and this without the interference of God or any of his angels.

Those, however, who choose to think that a miracle was performed in this case, and are of the opinion that God caused the mouths of the beasts to be closed, so they could not bite his servant Daniel, certainly have the right to entertain such belief. How would such persons like to make the test, by having a dozen priests make long prayers over them, imploring the protection of heaven, and then be thrown into a cage with a lot of hungry lions? Would they be willing to trust themselves to the safe keeping of their God under such circumstances? Is God less able, or less disposed to stop lions' mouths now, than twenty-five hundred years ago? If he did it then, why not now? It is our opinion God and angels interfered very little with the mouths of lions; they are, doubtless, left to be governed by the natures they are endowed with; and this was the case in Daniel's time as much as now; but it being a free country, any one can believe the affair took place as narrated; and can also believe it was a striking miracle if they can persuade themselves to do so.

After this Daniel went into the dreaming business, and some of his dreams portended great events. One of his dreams was in reference to four beasts rising from the sea, one of which was like unto a bear with three ribs in his mouth and the rib spoke and uttered words. That certainly sounds like a dream and a crazy one at that. His second dream was about a big ram with long horns which bore down everything before it, till he met a goat, also with a long horn, and more powerful than he, which proved too much for him.

Daniel's dreams may be of vast importance to the human race, and it may be, God busied himself in writing them down for after generations, but if so, the world has hardly realized any benefit from it, except to have something to quarrel over and puzzle their simple minds about. It would seem, God could be able to find more important employment.

Besides dreams, Daniel also had visions while asleep with his face to the ground, and wherein they differed from dreams, is not very clear. One was about Michael, the great prince, when he shall stand up, and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake, some to everlasting life, and others to everlasting contempt. Daniel enquired of a man dressed in linen, and who stood upon the water, how it was, and the man told him there would be one thousand, two hundred and ninety days before it should take place; but that number of days, and that number of years passed, without the vision being fulfilled. Thousands are still enquiring, "when shall it be?" But old Daniel himself passed off the stage without knowing what his vision meant, and we will all do the same; we shall never know what the meaning of these vision was, for the simple reason that there was no meaning in it. Of such dreams and chimeras is the Christian creed composed.

Another Letter from Erastus F. Brown.

NEW YORK, Dec. 2d, 1875.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq.—Sir: My letter, printed in the last number of your paper, was neither intended for you, nor for publication. It was sent as a private communication to a gentleman, as a thrust at your "Open Letter," sent to me by him. Through a mistake which I very much regret, it was sent to you, and blazoned in your paper.

"The Christianity of Christ." What is this dreadful thing toward which you are striving to play the part of Hercules towards the Lernaean Hydra? Theodore Parker, in his tract, entitled, "A Lesson for the Day," thus describes it: "The Christianity of Christ is the highest and most perfect ideal ever presented to the longing eyes of man," and in his review of "Strauss' Life of Jesus," he says: "To write down the true Christian Church seems to me as absurd as to write down the solar system, or put an end to tears, joys and prayers. Still less have we any fear that Christianity itself should come to an end, as soon appear to fancy: a form of Religion which has been the parent and guardian of all modern civilization; which has sent its voice to the end of the world, and now addresses equally the heart of the beggar and of the monarch; which is the only bond between societies; an institution cherished and clung to, by the choicest hopes and the deepest desires of the human race, is not in a moment to be displaced."

"Ever since the day that he was in the flesh, the Redeemer's image has been stamped ineffaceably on the hearts of men; even if the letter should perish,—which is holy only because it preserves to us this image,—the image itself would remain forever. It is stamped so deeply in the hearts of men that it can never be effaced, and the words of the Apostle will ever be true, "Lord, wither shall we go? thou only hast the words of eternal life."

But what is offered to us in the place of this, so precious? James Fitzjames Stephen, in his recent work, entitled, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," says: "Each must act as he thinks best, and if he is wrong, so much the worse for him. We stand on a mountain pass in the midst of whirling snow and blinding mists, through which we get glimpses, now and then, of paths, which may be deceptive. If we stand still, we shall be frozen to death. If we take the wrong road, we shall be dashed to pieces. We do not certainly know whether there is any right one."

Turning from this dark picture, to the "Christianity of Christ," let us say, sweet it is with courage-giving hopes. From your "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," I will now assume that you are bewildered, by the supernatural history of his life; but there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in your philosophy. The wise Lord Bacon said: "A little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion." I therefore urge you to drink deep, or taste not; shallow draughts intoxicate, drink largely; and that will sober you. Then will the truth break upon your mind, "that Nature and the Supernatural together constitute the one system of God."

Yours,

ERASTUS F. BROWN.

REPLY.—While we perceive a decided improvement in the tone and style of the above, when compared with Mr. Brown's previous letter, published in our last, we cannot but notice the peculiarity of his defense. He says now, that letter was not intended for publication, nor for us to see. Can it be possible he would direct a letter to us; call us a deliberate liar; say we were a child of the Devil; ask why we presumed to trouble his master, and wind up with the sage advice to us, to be decent, and not mean it for our eye, but to be read by a near friend of ours? Does that put any better face on the matter? If it is Christian to write a scurrilous, untruthful letter, to be read only by cherished friends, with the design that it should not be read by the party nominally addressed, we cannot think it is honorable or gentlemanly. Is that such a "thrust" as a just man would be likely to make? Under other circumstances we do not believe Mr. Brown could think so himself, as he is undoubtedly a gentleman. We must, then, attribute his course in this matter, to his creed, or religion, and not to his own inherent sense of right. It is another item in the long score against Christianity.

We have never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Brown, but from the admiration he has for the character of Jesus, we judge the organ of veneration is well developed in his cranium; we venture the opinion that the center part of his head is somewhat elevated. Jesus is his model of excellence and true worth, and his veneration impels him to worship and adore that ideal. Our head is rather level on the top, and it is not easy for us to venerate and worship any mythical, doubtful character.

Nothing in the world is more fully proved, than that human beings can easily be made to believe in imaginary personages, and that, by constantly hearing the good qualities of any individual who has lived continually lauded and be-praised, that an undue degree of admiration and reverence is excited.

What can be more real to an imaginative child, than the absolute existence of St. Nicholas or "Santa Claus"—the patron saint for juveniles during the Christmas holidays? A little girl, who, on Christmas morning, finds a beautiful doll or a set of toy-dishes in her stocking, believes, just as firmly, in the existence and goodness and benignity of Santa Claus, and would be as indignant to hear his personality or good character questioned, as Mr. Brown is, in reference to his demi-god, Jesus. Has not the little girl ocular demonstration that Santa Claus exists, and thinks of her and loves her? Has Mr. Brown anything more? Has he as much?

Unfortunately for Jesus and his worshipers, there is a great want of authenticity, in the first place, as to his existence. We have simply the statements of what purports to be biographies of him, written by four individuals of whom we know nothing and can know nothing, and which is entirely unconfirmed by any cotemporaneous history. It does appear that these stories were not known to be in existence for over one hundred years after Jesus is said to have lived, and even according to the claims of Christian writers, the gospels were not written till thirty, and some of them sixty years after Jesus died.

When the great difficulty which always exists in obtaining the real facts in all occurrences and items of history is remembered; when it is borne in mind that right here among ourselves, where the facilities for writing, printing and rapidly disseminating intelligence are a thousand times greater than eighteen hundred years ago; when we know it is a fact that not a strictly truthful report was ever written of a single battle that occurred in our recent war; when it is a truth that, in the compiling of the great "American Cyclopædia," now being revised and re-published by the Appletons, upon which there are engaged such an able corps of editors and revisers, who assiduously and constantly labor to keep out all errors and mistakes, when, despite all the caution and watchfulness, the most glaring mistakes have crept in with regard to our Croton water works, the capacity of the various reservoirs, and the amount of water discharged from each, as well as other statistics in reference to Croton, which would seem could be easily and correctly obtained; when, we say, these facts are borne in mind, as well as the truth that the early fathers and founders of Christianity were notorious for their inventions and pious frauds, can we, with any degree of certainty, take the statements of unknown persons, who are supposed to have lived nearly two thousand years ago, especially when they relate many things that are impossible and could never have occurred?

If Jesus was begotten by a ghost—if he had no father, except an invisible, impalpable, imponderous phantom, what earthly chance had Matthew or Luke to know anything about it? They make no claim of writing by inspiration, and if they did, could we believe them implicitly? If any one or two writers, or reporters, or priests, should now write a statement that a young, obscure girl had become a mother without one of the opposite sex having intercourse with her, would the world believe such a story? Ought it to believe it? Were story-tellers in olden time any more reliable than now? Were not fable, fiction and error more blended with what they meant for history than in the present age of the world? When in recitals of the present time we find we are compelled to take them with many grains of allowance, is it not quite as necessary to use caution in this direction with the uncertain stories of olden time? Is there any virtue in belief without proof? Is not the little girl who believes in Santa Claus upon the strength of what she is told, equally as meritorious as Mr. Brown who believes in the remarkable conception, the remarkable life, the remarkable death, and the remarkable resurrection and ascension of Jesus, simply because four unknown and unreliable persons agreed indifferently in saying so?

Matthew states that at the crucifixion the sun ceased to give light for several hours, that terrible earthquakes occurred which opened the graves, and that those who were dead and buried came forth out of their graves and mixed again with their former companions; is it not a little singular that neither Mark, Luke, nor John, nor Peter, Paul, nor Jude, nor Celsus, Josephus, nor Pliny knew nothing and said nothing about it? If such an occurrence should take place now, can it be supposed one single individual would be all who would take any notice of it? Is any sensible person under any obligation to believe a writer when he states such great improbabilities, especially when he can be convicted of a score of mis-statements in other lesser matters? Is there any virtue in believing a falsehood at any time?

We do not say that Jesus never lived, but we do say there is no proof that he did. When we consider that what are called the "four gospels" might very easily have been written by Eusebius or some of the other early fathers, priests or monks who were anxious to transplant the older pagan mythologies of the East into Judea and to re-localize the antique notions of India, Persia and Egypt, and when it is known to be a fact that almost every incident narrated in the life of Jesus had its prototype more than five hundred Foundations.

BY JOHN SYPHERS.

The Scriptures inform us that a house built upon the sand must sooner or later tumble. A good solid foundation is indispensable to the permanency of a house or a castle in architecture, and equally so in respect to a religious organization or church. When we hunt for the bed rock of the organization, called "the church." We must admit that it is something hard to find. That sure foundation stone, that was once laid in Zion, has slipped from under it by some means or other. Modern religion rests on no natural facts or principles, but is based upon a few myths, a few superstitions, a few bogus miracles, and a big ghost story!

I design to look into this big spook story, so intimately connected with the life and history of the hero of the New Testament, Jesus Christ. I have often wished that the ghost story connected with the birth of Christ had been left out of his history. Even if it were literally true, I think it would have been much better to have left it out. If Christ is a sure foundation stone, laid in Zion, upon which to build the Church of the world, I don't think the story that he was ghost-begotten and virgin-born helps the foundation in the least. It makes the foundation no broader, no deeper, no firmer to tell that spooky story about his mother's intimacy with a ghost in the overshadowing business.

The story seems to be so completely outside of the ordinary course of things, that it has caused his followers to become the objects of much ridicule and laughter, as well as the butt of many a sarcastic joke. The story seems to the minds of the "unregenerate" as a faithful copy of an old Egyptian story concerning the virginity of the mother of one of their great redeemers, saviors, reformers or law-givers, if not gods. Matthew and the other evangelists tell this story of ghostly intercourse just as if they had been present and saw it all; but they knew not that such a man existed until he was thirty years old, and had thrown away the hammer, the square, the saw and the jack-plane and had gone into the preaching business. It follows, then, that this story which they have been telling the world, was all hearsay with them, and to us it must be third or fourth-handed. Mary should have told this story to the world herself if it was true. She would be better testimony than even Christ himself, as all that he would be supposed to know about the matter would be what his mother told him.

The general popular idea of a ghost is, that it is something very thin. If the thing actually took place as narrated, it is the most masterly piece of materializing to be found in all the annals of the past. If that ghost actually did do what is ascribed to it in the sacred Scriptures, if God was really the father of this gifted young man, possessing such fine spiritualistic powers and mediumistic development, then he must have completely materialized himself to get within the laws governing the transmission of animal life. A bare, unmaterialized ghost is altogether too thin a substance to exercise those laws and functions necessary to reproduction. The thinking portion of the world must and ever will look upon this story as being concocted by the parties interested, as a dodge by which to get rid of certain odious reflections which society was sure to heap upon the parent who gave birth to children under such very suspicious circumstances.

Many church people turn up their noses at the modern manifestations of spiritual power, declaring that they don't believe in ghosts, no, not they! It is a sure sign of a weak mind to believe in ghosts, say they, and yet the very first thing you strike on opening their New Testament, is one of the most improbable ghost stories to be found in the religious annals of the whole world; that a ghost—a holy ghost, i. e., a good ghost—should be the father of a child by a little curly-headed, black-eyed Jewish girl. The people in the town where she lived, doubtless had many a laugh over the story she or her friends set afloat, that she was with child by a ghost!

When Joseph and little Mary went up to the city of Bethlehem to be taxed, they found that the scandal had got there before them, and the landlord at the hotel would not keep them. They were notorious characters, and their names as connected with this scandal had spread abroad.

The historians try to smooth the matter over by saying that the hotel was full, and that there was no room for them. If that little Jewish girl ever did make that old bachelor—Joseph, the barn-builder—believe that the father of her child was a ghost, then she was not only smart but tricky as well. And Joseph, the old fool, I do wonder if he lived all his life and never discovered how completely she had pulled the wool over his eyes? I am sorry to have to say it, but I must be true to myself and put myself square upon the record before I leave this world forever, by saying that I feel just as sure that this whole Jesus business is a "put-up" job upon an ignorant world, as I am sure that I am in this room at this time, and writing with this pen.

The vicarious business, or salvation by proxy, or salvation through the name of Christ, or by the or any one else, I am mentally, morally and spiritually certain is one of the most monstrous humbugs that ever was perpetrated upon man. Man must save himself by a growth in knowledge and a continual development into higher conditions of spirituality and purity. I have found out to a demonstrated certainty, that there is no other name under heaven or among men whereby I can be saved, save the name of John Syphers, and him not crucified, either. And, my dear reader, you will yet find out the same things concerning yourself, either in this world or in the next. But the great foundation of the faith of the sectarian religious world is an old religious work called the Bible, or rather Bi-bills, as it was for a long time called, it being a collection of old bills which had been laid by for a great while before the thought struck the priests to collect them into a book. The New Testament is a compilation, a collection of a great many small pamphlets on religious subjects, written, most of them, by a little tailor who plied his needle and thread, and hung out his shingle—Andy Johnson like—in the city of Damascus, until a streak or wave of inspiration struck him, and then he broke his needle, took down his sign and started out preaching.

In the old part of this great old foundation book, upon which everything has been built, and by which every vile chimera that ever danced through the cranium of visionary men, has been proved, is told many amusing stories, one or two of which I will take a little peep at before closing this article.

The Lord is not only the hero, but also a star actor upon the wide theater of the Old Testament as well as the New. He generally played leading and heavy parts. At one time he was billed to appear in the country of the Orient as a "city burner," but in this role I do not think he distinguished himself by adding anything to a good reputation. At one time he determined to destroy a certain city. What the provocation was, I know not, but opine that it was altogether whimsical on his part, for it seems to me nothing could justify a Lord or anybody else in destroying a whole city from the face of the earth for any cause whatever. In these wholesale destructions the innocent must suffer with the guilty, the babe and the innocent child with the adult. The Lord held a council in his audience chamber and elected that certain cities must burn. But before applying the torch and playing the incendiary on so large a scale, he thought it best to set a price on the towns. He actually came down and capitulated with the inhabitants concerning the destruction of their town. He thought fifty righteous men about a fair price for a city of its size. He levied no contribution, either in gold or greenbacks upon them. As for gold, it was already a drug in his kingdom, so much so, indeed, that the very streets were paved with it. But he demanded of them (very unfortunately) the very thing of which just at that time they were about as good as out of. Good, solid, honest, upright and righteous men were at that time so very scarce in the city, that it would take a philosopher with five lamps, all well trimmed and burning in broad daylight to find one!

Now if this Lord was a real, genuine Lord, and not a bogus article, he knew well enough their impoverished condition with respect to the article demanded; he knew that he was setting the price too high—so high, indeed, that they never could reach it. He promised faithfully that if the fifty men, possessing the requisite qualifications, were forthcoming against a given time, he would spare the city; but if not, up she goes in flame and smoke!

But the poor, frightened citizens, Mayor and other officials, when they came to canvass the city, they found it to be very like many of our modern cities—the righteous men that it contained could all be counted on your fingers and then have plenty of fingers to spare. Men who could fill the bill were found to be alarmingly scarce. They soon discovered that their only salvation consisted in being able to Jew the Lord down in his price. They returned to the Lord with long faces, beclouded with gloom, and told him that there was no use talking, unless he would come down in his price, the city was doomed.

The Lord then graciously reconsidered the matter, and came to the conclusion that perhaps he had been a little too steep in his price. He then, with great reluctance, reduced the price from forty to thirty, and even came down to ten men; and at that low figure, even, they had to give it up, being entirely unable to raise that number. But why did he demand fifty men at first, when he knew very well (if he knew all things) that the whole city could not scare up a baker's dozen of her citizens who could fill the bill? The whole thing, from first to last, was a very shabby transaction.

Now, if that ancient Lord, who figures so conspicuously in the role of an incendiary and town-burner, is the same one that they preach about now-a-days, then I cannot worship him for a moment. I cannot work up my organ of veneration to such a pitch as to throw myself on my knees before him, considering all the mean things that sacred history lays to his charge. I cannot worship him, nor indeed scarcely treat him with decent respect.

In the olden time, this great Lord of the Christians used to keep some old, bald-headed men going about as his ministers, attending to business for him. You remember, no doubt, the Bible story of one of these, a poor, miserable old soul, "barefooted on the top of his head," who thought himself a prophet. He was going on a mission of the Lord's up to a certain city, no doubt to prophecy against the inhabitants thereof, was accidentally spied by some children who were at play by the roadside. They began to poke a little fun at him, and the fearful consequence was that the Lord sent his bears down upon the little mischiefs, and they were devoured by them.

This was a very foolish act on the part of the Lord, for the children were only in fun. The prophet was nobody but a superannuated, worn-out old man, who was not worth to the world, either physically, mentally or morally the powder and lead that would blow him up! Why must so many bright-eyed, beautiful, cheerful, sprightly, laughing, curly-headed little boys and girls be eaten up by bears for his sake? The world and society had much at stake in these children. They were the idols of loving parents, and the future hope of the country. But what had the world at stake in the old bald-head? Nothing, absolutely nothing. If the Lord's bears had to eat somebody, why did he not turn them loose on the old, defunct man, and let the children live? How many children does it usually take to make a couple of the Lord's bears a mess, anyhow? But that depends, I suppose, altogether upon how hungry they are. Now my private opinion, publicly expressed, is, that there is a bare possibility that this bear story is a bare-faced lie!

I do not write these things to assist in destroying the Bible, which has many sweet and spiritual things in it, but to assist in breaking the spell which enshrouds the minds of thousands upon thousands who worship it as an idol, and think ignorantly that it is the only foundation, and on it the salvation of man hinges, and the hope of the world rests. Every idol must be broken to pieces by the great hammer of truth and reason, wielded by the strong arms of the iconoclasts of the age, before men will be taught the great lesson that they must look to themselves alone for salvation.

Big stories, like Gulliver's travels,
In a Bible are much out of place;
They're all right in Don Quixote and Crusoe,
But to a Bible the greatest disgrace.

Glimpse of an Un-holy Bible.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I send you a short clip from a book just ready for the press. It has been supposed that Paine exposed nearly all the the gross blunders of the Bible, but he does not show one in a hundred. The book referred to will be a complete work, annotated and with references given. It will astonish even the deepest reader, and will only deal in apparent errors.

"And it came to pass, in the four hundred and eightieth year, after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month of Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the Lord (1 Kings, vi. 1.)

"Now these are the generations of Pharez: Pharez begat Hezron, and Hezron begat Ram, and Ram begat Aminadab, and Aminadab begat Naashon, and Naashon begat Salmon, and Salmon begat Boaz, and Boaz begat Obed, and Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David." (Ruth, iv. 18-22.) (Matt. 1-2-6.) "And Judas—Judas begat Pharez."

Just so, that makes assurance doubly sure. Ten generations from Judah to Solomon.

"David was thirty years old when he began to reign and he reigned forty years." (2 Sam. v. 4.)

Now, Pharez was born before the Jews went down to Egypt, and as the whole history of Joseph in Egypt comes after the birth of Pharez it is fair to presume that Pharez was some thirty years old before going down to Egypt, for he had two sons. (See Genesis xvi. 12.)

"Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt." (Ex. xii. 40-41.)

Oh, how good it seems to have the holy, inspired writer so positive; well, then, from the day the Jews entered Egypt to the day Solomon began the temple, in the fourth year of his reign, the time was just nine hundred and ten years.

Now, subtract the four years of Solomon's reign, and the seventy years of David's life, from the nine hundred and ten years and it leaves eight hundred and thirty-six years to be divided among the nine generations inclusive from Pharez to Jesse, or ninety-two and eight-ninths for each man; that is to say, ninety-three years before any of them had a son born—for the reigning genealogies are drawn from the first born son.

Then we have whatever years of age Pharez was before he went to Egypt to add to this eight hundred and thirty-six, say thirty, for he had two sons, making eight hundred and sixty-six or ninety-six years to each generation. Now who believes such foolish trash, to say that each one of these excellently preserved old patriarchs forbore marriage till above ninety; or, if married, had no children until ninety.

four years of age, is asking too much of our gullibility.

O, Inspiration, what a fool thou wert to get caught in the toils of common addition. Amply inspired thou mightest have shunned the breakers of science. Thou must have known that science would scatter thy facts to the winds raised by the breath of scorn.

Man was bound by the enslaving toils of bigoted belief, and would have gulped down any marvelous tale thou mightest have told, what a fool thou wert to put a club in his hand with which to beat out thy brains.

How simple, and at the same time how indisputable would have been the words of Ezra, when he invented his commission from the king of Persia: "Peace, and at such a time." (Ezra, iv. 17.) If inspiration had only put such a roving date to all the events and marvels he records, how soothing it would now be to the true believer, who finds on every hand a desire to square all things by a mathematical precision.

But the above does not comprise the only grossly lying statements by any means. Whenever the Bible gives two separate accounts of the same event, in which arithmetic can be used to compute time or quantity, one will nearly always be found to dispute the other.

"And these are the names of the sons of Levi, according to their generations: Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari, and the years of the life of Levi were a hundred and thirty and seven years * * * And the sons of Kohath, Amram, and Tzhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel: and the years of the life of Kohath were a hundred and thirty and three years * * * And Amram took Jochebed, his father's sister to wife, and she bore him Aaron and Moses, and the years of the life of Amram were a hundred and thirty and seven years." (Ex. vi. 16-20.)

Now, Levi was the third son of Jacob, and was an old man comparatively when they went down to Egypt, for Judah's youngest son was a man grown before they went to Egypt. (Gen. xli. 12.) And Judah was younger than Levi, and Pharez the bastard son of Judah had two sons before they went to Egypt. (Gen. xli. 12.) And Pharez was born after Judah's family were all grown up and married, so Kohath must have been an old man before he went to Egypt. Then Jacob was a hundred and thirty years old when he went to Egypt. (Gen. xlvii. 9.)

Now all this data places the age of Kohath, the son of Levi, at about fifty or sixty, for he was the second son of Levi, and Levi the third son of Jacob. Now, presuming Levi to have been born when Jacob was thirty or forty, and Kohath when Levi was thirty, now subtract this from Jacob's age when he went to Egypt, and you have Kohath's age fifty or sixty. Now, let us see, we have left of Kohath's life sixty or seventy years after he went to Egypt. Amram, his son, lived one hundred and thirty-seven years, and Moses was his second son, and was eighty years old when he left Egypt. (Ex. vii. 7.) (Deut. xxxiv. 7.) (Joh. v. 6.)

Now let us see, we have of Kohath's life seventy, of Amram's one hundred and thirty-seven; and of Moses eighty, making, of the whole time of their lives, but two hundred and eighty-seven years. But let us compute this in a more common-sense way for no one can suppose Moses was born when his father, Amram, was one hundred and thirty-seven years old, nor Amram when his father, Kohath, was sixty. Suppose, then, that Amram was born when Kohath was forty, that is ten years before the migration into Egypt, then that Moses was born when Amram was forty, then we have this result: Time from entering Egypt until they left it in Amram's lifetime, before the birth of Moses, thirty years; during Moses' life eighty years.

"Now the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years." Just exactly. (Ex. xii. 40-41.)

Now, bigoted reader, should any such be found who could be induced to read this, how will you answer this? I know how, leaving all argument, all proofs, all good sense, all gentlemanly fair dealing, you will try to ward off these deadly blows against your besotted fanaticism, by attempting to prove by brassy assertion, unsupported by proof, that the author is a criminal of the deepest dye, a hardened villain from whose breast every scintilla of goodness has long ago vanished.

Well, suppose you could prove all this, would it make these lying figures match better? Would all creation then be bound to bow the slavish knee before Jehovah, the Ogre of Jewry? Would that make the detestable characters of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Samuel, David or Elisha more endurable? If you can escape this go, Jehovah loves such worshipers, who without question adore him and the Bible, the most fearful book ever published.

But as for me, I cannot mould my idea of Deity, by comparing him with your cruel tyrant.

In my book, "The Unholy Bible," I have references of infinite value to the seeker after Truth. It is written without a particle of reverence for ancient humbugs, without fear, without straining a point, and its remarks are simply just. The Old Testament is ready for the press, and the New will be ready soon. OCCIDENTUS.

He that Believeth Not shall be Damned.

The spirit, or main principle, the essence of Christianity is most abominable that was ever conceived by man. What business is it to you, if I will not assume that a proposition is true, that I have not one evidence to prove it true?

By what authority do you continue my living existence in an endless hell of fire? Because I will not say I believe that which I do not believe? This is Christianity, and has been ever since it has had an existence. If there ever was a God greater than man, and that Creator had written on every stone on earth the above text, and the reason, only one reason, "He that believeth not," it would have seemed strange enough to us, that the everywhere present, all-seeing Creator should write such a law, and the one reason on all the stones. And we would be punished in hell-fire, without any priest about it. "All things are possible with the Creator," or "God" say they. It seems strange to us now, that Omnipotence, Omniscience, Omnipresence, Almighty Power, three of them, did not, or could not manage mankind without priests. Saint Peters is the Satan (Matt. xi. 23). We account for it only in one way. According to Dr. Clarke, seventy-five gospels were rejected because of the style, doctrine etc. Those we have now are no older than the 6th or 7th centuries. When Bible revising was in fashion, from A. D. 1529, Tyndale's did not suit the hierarchy, and we have got now some fifteen versions. "All the omissions and additions" says Clarke, "do not endanger a salvation of the soul. God has watched over and preserved what is most important." He might have said St. Peter has watched. The murders, suffering, misery, and woe perpetrated since Christianity started are overwhelming evidence that it is the priests' fabrication. The holy horror, they manifest if a man express a doubt of its divinity, and their readiness to murder, imprison, torment, and persecute is positive evidence of falsehood. Our text, so often recited by them, not he that believeth not, God will damn to endless hell-fire; but "he that believeth not shall be damned," (they have practically said, God or no God, is proof of priest's fabrication. The first chapter of Genesis is proof. "In the beginning"—no man ever had any evidence that the Universe had a beginning. It exists, but its existence is proof of its eternity until you prove that there was a time when it was not.

"God created." The name "God" was fabricated from an Anglo Saxon word that our ancestors used to express good, in general, and they applied it to an imaginary, unknown being.

The Catholics make salvation depend upon the Church, without books.

That Zeus, Deus, Dieu, and God, all created the Universe, is simply false. "Created out of nothing" they say. An infinite, eternal, self-existent Being caused all existence to arise out of non-existence. Bah! "bara." Parkhurst says, "The first definition of 'bara' is to create. Did the Christo-Jew-God make words for his chosen people, so that each word meant five different things? Well, a priest-forged God could do it. Every time the name "God" is represented in our English Bible, noun and pronoun, they are proofs of priests' fabrication. Dr. Lardner, E. S. Guild, and others quote from the Christian Fathers, that they did lie in support of their superstition, and Dr. Mosheim admits it. Christian priests forge a name, and repeat that name millions on millions of times, and that becomes by repeating a real person, creator of the Universe.

As said in the Analogy, by Bishop Butler, "The lowest presumption is of the nature of a probability, and often repeated amounts to a certainty. In other words, a lie preached 1875 years makes our present state of morality, piety, and civilization, and a revelation by a human Jehovah God. For absurdity this cannot be beat. The earth was bolu tohu, rendered, "without form and void,"—"a formless vacuum." Did God know how the thing looked? Priests can put a meaning to pohu tohu, and it will be holy writ. You could not describe it. You said it was Bolu tohu. And darkness covered infinite space; and God who is light, and in him is no darkness at all, said, "Let there be light, and there was light the first day. The second day, the sky, heaven, was made; and the third day, the earth, grass, trees, beech-nuts, the centre of our solar system, etc. The fourth day, the sun, moon, and also stars were made and put in the sky, to separate day from night, Shomayin. In the fifth day, great whales were created. In the sixth day four-footed beasts, creeping things, male and female; and man, to our image, after our likeness. That the author of the Universe ever told man such stuff is the most absurd of all absurdities. Now, were it not for the fear of fire, fogot, thumb screws, piners, the rack, endless damnation in hell (in a living state) after we are dead, and immortal souls; (all priests' forgery) there is not a sane man on earth who would not reject the Christo-Jew-book, and Josephus (each proves the other false), with the utmost contempt, as a base fabrication, until the Creator makes man know unmistakably that his true name is God, and that he did make the Christo-Jew book without a priest.

Divinity of Christianity.

A standing argument in favor of the divinity of Christianity is the benignity of its character, the rapidity with which it has spread, and the great prevalence it has obtained in the world. How do the facts support this claim? The religions of the world are as follows:

Buddhists, 360,000,000; Brahmins, 160,000,000; Mahometans, 250,000,000; Christians, [Communicants], 120,000,000; Jews, 5,000,000; Idolotars, 150,000,000; Modern Spiritualists, 10,000,000; Nothingarians, 100,000,000; Unclassified, 175,000,000.

Thus we see there are more Idolotars than Christians, more Brahmins, twice as many Mahometans, and three times as many Buddhists. If the Jews are taken as a unit, they stand thus: Jews, 1, Spiritualists, 2; Nothingarians, 20; Christians, 25; Idolotars, 30; Brahmins, 32; Unclassified, 38; Mahometans, 50; Buddhists, 72.

For every Christian in the world there are over ten who are not Christians. If it has taken over eighteen hundred years to gain one tenth part of the race to Christianity, it will, at the same rapid rate, require eighteen thousand years to bring the whole world to Jesus; but according to our leading clergymen the progress of the world to Christianity is much like the toad's getting out of the well, "one forward, and two back." Rev. Dr. Talmage says, "Oh! we have magnificent church machinery in this country; we have sixty thousand American ministers; we have costly music; we have great Sunday-schools; and yet I give you the appalling statistics that in the last twenty-five years, laying aside last year, the statistics of which I have not yet seen, within the last twenty-five years the churches of God in this country have averaged less than two conversions a year each. There has been an average of four or five deaths in the churches. How soon, at that rate, will this world be brought to God? We gain two; we lose four. Eternal God, what will this come to?" According to this, the grand conversion of the whole world must be postponed many, many years. Are there then, in the numbers which have embraced Christianity, the slightest proof of its divinity? By no means.

How about its benignity? No religion in the world has persecuted so much as the Christian. Nay, all combined have not begun to compare with it in this hellish business. Untold thousands have in cold blood been by it brought to the stake, the block, the scaffold, the rack and the dungeon; and in all this scarcely a scintilla of mercy was shown. 60,000,000 of human beings have lost their lives in Christian wars. Christianity and Mahometanism have been established and spread by the sword, and rivers of human blood have run in the name of their God. In the Jewish wars of Jehovah millions of lives were sacrificed. Not so with the Heathen: the history of their religion has not been written in blood. Not all the pagan religions of the world have put to death one-tenth the number of human beings that the Christian religion has. Where then are the proofs of its divine origin? Where is the evidence of its superiority and truthfulness over other forms of belief? If it has taken more life; if it has caused more misery and woe than other religions it certainly is worse than they. Though wily and designing priests persistently tell us that Christianity possesses all that is good, all that is lovely, all that is moral, all that is godly, all that is true in the world, the claim is positively false. Its record is dark and damning, and all the excellence it possesses comes from humanity. It is nearly all borrowed from older systems of faith.

THE Catholic Church in the United States probably numbers 8,000,000 communicants. The Catholics occupy 6,920 stations, chapels, and churches. They have the service of 4,874 priests, 6 apostolic vicars, 49 bishops, 9 archbishops and one cardinal. They have 12 theological seminaries with nearly 1,500 students; over 2,000 schools of all grades and more than 300 asylums and hospitals. There are more than 7 different orders of monks and friars, 12 of nuns, 8 different institutions, such as the Jesuits and Redemptionists, 12 congregations of priests and brothers, and 30 sisterhoods. Much of the money that is required to run these institutions of superstition has been craftily wrung from the confiding Miceys and Bridgets who carry the hod and do the kitchen work.

THE English explorations of Palestine are going on satisfactorily. Surveyors are triangulating the country at large expense, and the "Palestine Fund" publishes a quarterly statement containing papers of great interest to Biblical students. The last volume has a valuable paper on the scene of David's duel with Goliath. Perhaps if they hunt around earnestly, they may find the place where David triangulated for Bathsheba, Uriah's beautiful wife. That will be a most valuable acquisition for Bible students.

NEARLY 600,000 persons were employed during last year in and about the coal, fire clay, iron stone and shale mines of Great Britain and Ireland, about four-fifths of whom were occupied under ground.

years earlier, in Christna, Buddha, Prometheus and many others, it is more easy for a plain, matter-of-fact man, who is not biased by early education, to think the whole story a borrowed one, rather than that the same events of half a millennium before should take place over again. Can we justly ascribe to Jesus, priority and originality for sentiments, and doctrines which were positively known to have been taught hundreds of years earlier by the Essenes of Alexandria, and other localities?

But admitting that Jesus did live, and there were doubtless many by the name the same as there are at this day in Spain and Mexico, and as for two thousand years there have been Jameses and Joshuas, he was only a man who was begotten and born like other human beings, who lived and died like them, and after he was dead did not arise again and go sailing up bodily in the air where it is cold enough to freeze a man through and through in five minutes. His praises, his wonders and his super-humanity have been so long sung and reiterated that thousands of people like Mr. Brown have absolutely got to believe that such a remarkable person once lived on the earth, and that he was God and made the Universe.

There is no lack of instances where human beings of only ordinary traits of character, have had great honors thrust upon them, and especially after death, have been deified and have been elevated to a niche of great eminence in the temple of adulation. In olden times it was very common, and even in the last century there has been plenty of it. How Napoleon Bonaparte has been revered and magnified in all his excellent qualities far beyond the reality, constituting him a hero, a wonder and almost a demi-god, while his enemies saw little in him to admire. How our own Washington, by being extolled, be-praised, and always spoken of as a perfect, faultless individual, is now revered by millions far beyond his real merits. One of the tendencies of the human mind, especially the ignorant and superstitious portion, is to "hero-worship." This, however, will gradually pass away, as intelligence and correct thinking gains sway in the world.

If Jesus did live, and if he said every word that is attributed to him, why should he be credited with great power and wisdom, and with divinity itself, when he uttered no better, no wiser, no more God-like sayings, than Zoroaster, Buddha, Christna, Confucius, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, and many others who lived hundreds of years before him? Is there a virtue in selecting one individual who has lived in the past, and in according to him all the wisdom, all the excellence and all the adorable characteristics that belong equally as much, to say the least, to numerous other individuals? Is it justice or equity to rob one individual or many individuals, of the honor and credit to which they are fairly entitled, and to bestow it upon another no more worthy than themselves?

Our friend quotes Theodore Parker. It is rather a new thing for Christians to quote him to sustain their institution. They neither recognized him as a Christian while he lived, nor had scarcely a kind word to say of him when he died. To them he was an Infidel almost equal to Paine or Voltaire. Had we room, we think we could quote many of Mr. Parker's sayings which Mr. Brown would hardly endorse. Theodore Parker was a great man, and was much farther advanced in mental freedom and boldness than the great majority of those around him; but he, too, like Mr. Brown, had an excessive amount of veneration, and he fancied he saw in the character of Jesus a vast amount to love and admire.

If Parker did say, on a certain occasion, when he had a special point to make, that "the Christianity of Christ is the highest and most perfect ideal ever presented to the longing eyes of man," it was an extravagant expression, unfounded in truth. We would like to have Mr. Brown, or any other individual, show wherein the morals or inculcations of Jesus were any higher or purer than those taught and believed by persons just named, none of whom claimed to be God. It is just as easy for the admirers and worshipers of Jesus to accord undue reverence to him, as it is for the worshipers of Buddha, Christna or Mahomet to do the same by them. Probably no Christian devotee can exceed the high degree of adoration which the several followers of these great leaders feel towards their beau-ideals. We who are without the circle can see that all are equally mistaken, and that virtue attaches to one no more than another for believing what is untrue.

If Christianity possesses all the excellence and virtue the world has ever known, is it not singular that it has produced more intolerance, more persecution, more bloodshed and more death, than any and all other religions the world has ever known? That this has been the case, and that the history of Christianity has been written in blood, can be easily shown.

Lord Bacon was truly a wise and a great man, and we will be glad if Christians ever become willing to accept all the positions he arrived at; but when he said, "a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to Atheism, but depth of philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion," it only proves that even great minds can err. How is it to-day? The greatest minds of the age, the ripest scholars, the soundest thinkers, and the most learned scientists, are those who have the least faith in theology, revealed religion and a personal God. In this category are enrolled Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Farraday, Proctor, Helmholtz, Buchner, Schmidt, Draper, Fiske, and numerous others of less distinction; while in the opposite column are found Moody and Sankey, Mrs. Grundy, Mrs. Partington, Erastus F. Brown, and unfortunately, too many more.

If it is a virtue for Mr. Brown to believe in his myth, it is equally a virtue for the little girl who hangs up her stocking, to believe in her myth, Santa Claus. And it is not strange, that, when she was told by her mother, that she was now getting large enough to lay aside her dolls and playthings, and be a woman; that there was no such person as Santa Claus, that, when her cherished ideals were thus so cruelly destroyed, she should reply in this wise: "Now Ma! If you have been telling me a story all this time, about Santa Claus, how do I know but you have been telling me a story about Jesus, too? If there is no Santa Claus, I don't believe there is any Jesus Christ either; there is as much proof of one as the other." And the little child was about right. If, in the opinion of her mother, it was time for her to lay aside childishness and error, and not believe longer in myths and fallacies, is it not also time for Mr. Brown and thousands of others to do the same, and embrace the universal truths which exist in nature and reason, and which depend neither upon Moses, Buddha, Zoroaster, Confucius, Christna, Plato, Aristotle, Christ, Mahomet, Luther, or Joseph Smith, but which exists inherently and eternally in the boundless Universe. May he, and numerous others, early come to see the truth as it is clearly brought to light by science and reason, which cause myths, superstition, and fables to step to the rear and to return to the shades of oblivion.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectures at Quincy, Ill., Dec. 10, 11, and 12. At Canton, Mo., Dec. 13, 14, and 15. His engagements at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, and Lincoln, Neb., are deferred for the present.

Our friend C. P. Somerby, 139 Eighth Street, has presented us with a copy of a sermon in pamphlet form, entitled "Who are the Infidels?" by Rev. John W. Chadwick. It is well worth reading.

We welcome the advent of a new Liberal paper, The Pacific Liberal. Published monthly by A. J. Boyer, San Francisco, at $1.00 per year. It is gotten up in good style, is ably conducted, and we wish it length of days and great success.

With Volume III., we wish to commence "THE OUTCAST," by Winwood Reade, who died a few months ago. He was one of the very best writers of the age, and this was his last production. It is a work of remarkable interest and ability, and will itself be worth the price of the paper for a year.

"THE WORLD'S SAGES, INFIDELS, AND THINKERS." We are daily receiving subscriptions for this valuable work, of over 800 pages, which will be issued within a few months. Reader, if you have not sent in your name, let us advise you to do so. We are sure you will not regret the investment. Sent by mail for $3.00. Let the list still grow.

We shall issue of Vol. III. several thousand extra copies for specimen numbers for those not on our lists. We will thank all our friends to send us in the names of Liberal people who will be likely to feel disposed to patronize the paper, that we may send them a copy. There are thousands who know nothing of the paper who would doubtless like to take it. Friends, help us to become acquainted with such.

BOUND COPIES of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Vol. II, containing thirty-two numbers, or 548 pages, will be furnished within a few days, and sent, post-paid, by mail, at $2.50, in heavy paper, and $3.25 in cloth and boards. They will last a life-time, and they contain much valuable reading matter, and will always be convenient for reference.

Bound Copies of Vol. I, of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be mailed for one dollar. We are prepared to fill orders. Let them come in.

Within the last ten days, we have sent out several hundred copies of the "Burgess-Underwood Debate," and "The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion." We will be equally as glad to send out a few hundred more copies before the end of the year. We are satisfied that they will please those who read them. They cannot be too widely circulated. Those who have not secured copies, will do well to do so. Debate, 60 cts. in paper; $1.00 in cloth. Pro and Con, 40 cts. in paper, 75 cts. in cloth. Sent, post-paid, by mail.

We are receiving daily assurances that THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS and TRUTH SEEKER LEAFLETS are doing much good over the country. Many order them to counteract the wild revival influences now so prevalent over the country. They are found very efficient in promoting clear views and good "common sense." See list on last page and notice the heavy discounts we make in quantities, and if you are troubled with the revival epidemic, send for a lot and circulate them freely. They are a good antidote.

"THE BIBLE IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS."—We have received a very able pamphlet by this title by Damon Y. Kilgore and published by the Liberal League of Philadelphia. It is one of the ablest productions we have seen upon this engrossing and very interesting subject, and we shall be pleased to make some extracts from it. Those who feel an interest upon this important question would do well to send for it. Price, single copy 10 cents, per hundred $5.00. Address, John S. Dyc, 2527 Brown St., Philadelphia.

Just as we are going to press, we have received a beautiful volume of poems, "The Cuban Martyrs," and others, by our friend, Charles Stephenson, of Rock Island, Ill. From the glance we have given the Poems, they are good, and evince a fair order of poetical talent. There are over two hundred pages in the volume, and more than sixty poems. Friend Stephenson writes us he will send us some to sell. We will be very glad to send to any who wish them. He did not name the price, but we judge it ought to be about $1.50. Bro. Stephenson is an ardent Liberal, and Liberals ought to buy his book.

MANY articles are crowded out of this issue by that "devilish lecture," which we delivered at Tremor Hall to a very respectable audience, on Sunday, the 5th inst. We carried out one of the injunctions of Jesus; we promised them one hour with the Devil, and gave them two. Although most of the audience remained till the close, some of them decided we "gave them the very Devil." Our readers may come to the same conclusion before they wade through it all. (See page 10.) Some who were present at the lecture complimented us by saying they would patiently have listened to it two hours longer, had it lasted so long. We hope many of our readers will find it equally interesting. The lecture is published in tract form, and will be mailed to any address at ten cents each, three for twenty-five cents, or seventy-five cents per dozen. Orders can be filled at once.

We shall issue before the closing of the year, "THIRTY DISCUSSIONS, LECTURES, BIBLE STORIES AND ESSAYS," by D. M. Bennett, including "Discussion on Prayer," with two clergymen. "The Story of Creation," "The Old Snake Story," "The Story of the Flood," "The Plagues of Egypt," "Korah, Dathan and Abiram," "Balaam and his Ass," "Arraignment of Priestcraft," "Joshua Stopping the Sun and Moon," "Samson and his Exploits," "The Great Wrestling Match," "Discussion with Elder Shelton," "Reply to Elder Shelton's Fourth Letter," "Discussion with George Snodde," "Honest Questions and Honest Answers," "The Gods of Superstition," "Moving the Ark," "Bennett's Prayer to the Devil," "Our Ecclesiastical Gentry," "Elijah the Tishbite," "Christianity a Borrowed System," "Elisha the Prophet," "Did Jesus Really Exist?" "Jonah and the Big Fish," "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," "The Ills We Endure, Their Cause and Cure," "Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego," "Daniel in the Lions' Den," "An Hour with the Devil," "Discussion with Erastus F. Brown," and "The Fear of Death." The whole will contain nearly six hundred pages, and a wood-cut likeness of the author. All for the extremely low price of $1.00 in cloth, and 75 cents in paper. Who wants copies? Those who get a copy of this and do not think they have had their money's worth, we will try and negotiate for the "Astor Library" for them. We can, at all events, promise that they shall have free access to the library from 10 A.M., to 3 P.M., for a year. This volume will be closely followed by three others of similar size and price, containing over eighty TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS, and comprising over 1,500 pages. Who wants the whole set?

Closing the Volume.

The present number completes Vol. II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which volume has continued sixteen months. We have reason to believe the much larger portion of our readers have been pleased with the paper, and have felt as though they had obtained the worth of their money. We have received information of numerous cases where the paper has carried conviction to the minds of those who have read its pages, and that many, by its aid, have had the scales of superstition removed from their eyes, and have been enabled to discern the truth as it is in nature and reason. We have satisfactory assurances that the paper has done good.

We thank those kind friends who have faithfully stood by us, and who, by their little contributions and remittances, have supplied us with the means to keep the paper running. Without this kind aid, it must, long since, have "gone to the wall." As long as such kind friends stand side by side with us, give the paper their support, and help us bear the burdens connected with it, we have full confidence that THE TRUTH SEEKER will be a living success.

As this is the last number of this volume, and of this year, it is a very suitable time for those who are indebted for a portion of the volume to remit the trifle due, and renew for the coming one. It is not pleasant for us to so often refer to this matter, but there is so large a number who seem to be indifferent, and it is so necessary that we have the little amounts due us, we cannot refrain.

The next number will be the commencement of the Weekly, and will appear in a new dress, and somewhat changed in form and style. It will contain some new features, and we trust that, with the experience we have had, we shall be able to make Vol. III. better than its predecessors. We shall, at all events, do our best.

It is a hard time for papers to keep alive. Since we commenced the publication of this sheet more than one thousand papers have been compelled to discontinue. We hope it will be long before THE TRUTH SEEKER will have to take that course.

Many have promised to send us new names with the new volume. We hope they will not fail to do so. We will be glad if every patron will send us a new name. Those who subscribe for Vol. III. before the end of the year will be entitled to this, the closing number of Vol. II. We shall also be glad to fulfill, to getters-up of clubs, offers made in a former issue.

We hope that every friend and reader who has been with us in this volume will continue with us in the next, and succeeding volumes. We do dislike to receive orders from any friend of Freethought and Liberal sentiments, to "Stop my Paper."

MATRIMONIAL.—Our advertising columns being otherwise occupied, we insert the following, here:

AN INFIDEL WIDOW LADY, living in retirement, would be pleased to correspond with some liberal-minded gentleman, between the age of thirty-five and fifty years, with a view to matrimony. Address, Mrs. E. L. DEVEREAUX, Cawker City, Kansas.

Here widowers and bachelors is a fine opportunity for you, which you should not neglect. From what we know of the lady, we can speak of her in the highest terms. We guarantee her intelligence and confirmed Liberal sentiments—such a prize as many a man ought to be glad to win. Who is the lucky man?

NEW YORK CITY, Dec. 6th, 1875.

DEAR EDITOR: I read some time since in one of our daily papers, of a great revival at Port Jervis, and that among the converts, were two subscribers to the Boston Investigator. I don't know how true it is, but I often see Infidels who need reviving, badly, and I wish all such could have spent two delightful hours, as I did last Sunday with you, and your really fascinating Devil; I guarantee they would have been effectually served. You referred to his Satanic Majesty's intercourse with women. In that glorious poem called Festus, which Margaret Fuller once said, "contained poetry enough to set up a dozen poets," there is to be found one of the most delicious love passages between Lucifer and Elisia, that ever was conceived in the brain of a poet. And I am happy to say, he bears himself on this trying occasion in the most manly and honorable way, thus corroborating your repeated statements, that he has not been guilty of one-half the meanness ascribed to him. I believe you will never find a more deserving character to defend, and I am sure the Devil himself will be perfectly satisfied with your treatment of him. He would indeed be hard to suit, should he fail to appreciate the treatment he received at the hands of a man so earnest and honest as yourself. Yours, DI VERNON.

"Contrivance does not Prove Design."

The above is the heading of an ably written article from the pen of Mr. John Syphers, printed in your edition of Nov. 15th.

The best of thinkers will sometimes be found contradicting themselves. Mr. Syphers says, page six, "There is no design in nature, consequently, no big mechanic is a designer." On the following page, "The ultimatum and elimination of spirit is the great design in the aggregation of matter into worlds in the first place." Do these two sentences not contradict one another? Mr. Syphers' standpoint is one very difficult to defend. The "Law of casualty" and the "Design in Nature" are two important points, which, up to the present time, no philosopher has been able to explain away. I do not undertake to write an article on these important philosophical questions, but I would like to read an explanation regarding the above contradictions, from the pen of your able contributor. M. STEIN.

Reflections

On the mode of making the world and all things thereon; as suggested by John Syphers in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"Worlds, in their present form and shape, were evolved by the force of inherent laws which always belonged to matter. . . . This is nothing more nor less than a world of chance, although the word chance, is not just the right word to use in speaking on this subject. Yes, this is a world of chance, and a very slim chance at that! It is a world of heterogeneous promiscuousness."—J. Syphers.

The author of this novel scheme of world-making will excuse me for italicising a few of his descriptive words, but they impressed me as being peculiarly emphatic in such a system of cosmogony as the work under consideration. I hope not to speak irreverently in saying that his plan of operations appears as destitute of design as did the act of the little boy whose musical talent was so evidently a gift of nature, that, when accused by his teacher of whistling in school, and the deed had been traced to his mouth, he positively denied the fact and declared that "It whistled itself."

Don't condemn my illustration of friend Syphers' plan of world-making, for the writer has positively set the world going in the same style, in first developing his plan.

It plainly appears from this view, that not only our world must have made itself, but, by a plain inference, all the other worlds in existence, must have come into existence by the same easy contrivance.

Although friend Syphers has succeeded in suggesting a plan for bringing a universe into existence, I am unable to discover any force in his argument, which, he presumes, has proved that there is no design in the works or laws of Nature. It is idle to dogmatize against certain principles, which all who comprehend the ordinary use of language, know to be self-evident and have so been considered, time immemorial.

In the affairs of human mechanism, where we behold a machine, so contrived, as to accomplish the end for which it was intended, we impute wisdom of design to the maker, just in proportion to the excellence with which the adaptation appears in the accomplishment of the work. Such a conclusion as this is so much the dictate of common sense, that a mere statement of the proposition is a sufficient confirmation of its truth. No reasoning man or woman pretends to question it. In applying the same rule to the works and laws of nature, I have never yet seen, nor can I see, the impropriety of the application, though its propriety has been flatly denied without the confirmation of even the semblance of reason. If, for instance, in the organization of a bird or beast, we discover certain qualities which pre-eminently fit them for their respective spheres of action—and without such qualities there is little room to believe that even its existence could be supported—is it not a reasonable and natural conclusion that there must have been a wise design in its formation? Just to specify a creature or two in which such qualities are found—how could the humming bird derive its subsistence from the honey in the cup of a flower, if its bill was shaped like that of other birds? Of what use would one shaped like that of a wren, a swallow and a hawk be to the little creature, which, while poised in air, at the very opening of the flower, inhales its precious contents. In this case, too, we see the peculiar conformation of the wings is quite as important as that of the bill. If chance was the builder of such a creature, it would scarcely seem that this singular power could have been quite blind.

Again, there is the mole—where would have been the use of eyes in such an animal of the size of a rat, or even a mouse? Was it not a wise adaptation? But, instead of conferring upon it a couple of glaring eyes—to have given it a couple that are shrouded by a "dim curtain"—argues design and surprising foresight.

But the above facts not only afford evidence of extraordinary means afforded for the subsistence of certain living creatures, but they manifest wonderful economy in the supply of the means. What uncouth fore-feet (more like hands) does this mole present! Yet how admirably are they adapted to its mode of life! Had its fore feet been like those of a rat or a mouse, of what use could they have been in its progress under ground? But none of the means afforded for its gaining a living are superfluous! Even its slender snout fulfills a most important agency.

One more illustration in conclusion. Of late years the readers of all newspapers have seen accounts of the sightless fishes in the mammoth cave of Kentucky. It is no longer questionable that the fish found in this cave are formed without eyes. According to the theory of my friend Syphers, his blind Deity may be supposed to have seen, at one time; or he was certainly sagacious and powerful to be equal to such an emergency. Was not this a display of foresight and adaptation?

But it is useless to enlarge further on the subject. I shall merely add in conclusion, that, although I have read with satisfaction the former charge, when he attempts to realize the conceptions of the Atheist viewing the fruits of the pumpkin-vine and the oak, I cannot quite see with him, eye to eye.

WM. H. JOHNSON.

P. S. The critic visitant from Jupiter, it is supposed, from the facts above presented, might have seen that some advantages may arise at least from animals being formed on a different plan.

EPITAPH in the cemetery at Keysville, N. Y.

Sarah Thomas is dead, and that's enough;

The candle is out, also the snuff.

Her soul's in heaven, you need not fear,

And all that's left is interred here.

In the Vermont Journal of March 31st, 1781, there is the following epitaph on a lawyer:

Beneath this stone lies Robert Shaw,

Who follow'd forty years the law,

And when he died,

The devil cried:

"Ha! Bob! give us your paw."

Here is the Yute account of the creation: "In the beginning the earth was covered with mists. You could not see before you. The Great Spirit took his bow and arrows and shot—shot so well that he scattered the mist. The earth became visible to him; but there were no men upon it. Then he took clay, fashioned a man, and set him to bake. The men came out white; the fire had not been strong enough. The Great Spirit began his work again, and this time the man came out black; he had remained too long in the oven. It was necessary to try a third time. The experiment at length succeeded, and a man came out done to a turn; he was a redskin, the most perfect of human types."

An Hour With the Devil.

BY D. M. BENNETT.

[Delivered before the New York Liberal Association, at Tremor's New Hall, 1266 Broadway, Sunday, Dec. 5th, 1875.]

As far back in the twilight of human existence as we are able to penetrate, we find our race has believed in evil spirits, demons, fiends and devils. In the night and gloom of man's primitive condition, before the light of intelligence and reason illumined his dark, uncultured mind, when he was an utter savage and lived in caves and fed upon the wild fruits of the earth and the carcasses of such animals as in unequal conflict he was able to subdue and slay, he first became aware of the forces and powers of nature, and that they often caused him pain and discomfort. He felt the burning rays of the sun, the storms and tempests, and the cold winds and biting frosts of winter. These annoyed him and deprived him of enjoyment, and he soon regarded them as enemies. That which contributed to his pleasure or comfort was good; that which prevented his happiness and enjoyment was evil.

Thus, in the childhood stage of his existence, and while he was unable to comprehend the true nature of these forces he soon learned to regard them as good or bad beings, which alternately pleased or displeased him. Being unable to realize the possibility of a force or result similar to himself, acting without extraneous aid, he naturally decided that the various forces of nature were the movements of invisible beings, some good and others bad.

As his observation and knowledge slowly enlarged, he perceived an increasing number of agencies and forces that affected him for good or ill, and consequently, the numbers of these invisible beings greatly multiplied; so much so, that a god or a demon was stationed by him at every waterfall, every river, every lake; in the woods, in the groves, in the shady dells, in the zephyrs, in the breezes, in the gales, in the hurricanes; in the north wind, the south wind, the east wind and the west wind; in day and night, in morning, noonday, and evening; in spring, summer, autumn, and winter; in fact he imagined and assigned a god, a demon, a sprite, a fairy, a gnome, to every form of matter and motion, and every place and condition of which he was able to take cognizance; and as to him there seemed to be more bad than good, it is not strange that his demons or devils greatly outnumbered his deities. As these imaginary spirits caused him disquietude, and interfered more directly with his happiness, his attention was more called to them and his ingenuity was taxed to please and placate them. To these he addressed his prayers and supplications, as upon them he wished to make the most favorable impression.

Crude and ignorant as primitive man was in this state of animism, he wished a representative for the sub-deities, sprites and devils alluded to, and he endowed numerous objects in nature with these invisible existences, and among such objects were cats, dogs, sheep, cattle, horses, birds, reptiles, fishes and numerous inanimate substances, as plants of numerous kinds, blocks of wood, stones, crude images of clay, etc., etc. This was the condition of feticism which all primitive nations had to pass through, and which led to more advanced ideas.

As man's intellectual powers enlarged, as he became able to imperfectly reason from cause to effect; as he learned to develop a crude language by which he could converse with his fellows, he was enabled to take higher views of the forces of nature which he came in contact with, and he began to have more comprehensive views of the nature of good and evil, and to assign them antagonistic positions in the world around him. It did not require long for him to perceive that the sun was the source of light and heat, and all vegetable and animal life. He regarded this orb as the great deity that caused all good results, and that its absence was the source of evil. Thus light and heat became to him great goods, and darkness and cold; great evils—the one a god, the other a devil, in perpetual warfare with each other, and in turn blessing and cursing the human race and all that has life. These opposite principles became fully personified as God and Devil, in the wake of each of which were numerous subordinates, as we have seen.

That the original condition of man was on the low, animal, savage plane alluded to, has, by the developments and acquisitions of science become so well established in the minds of the better informed portions of our race, that the fact is hardly longer questioned except by theologians and their supporters who have an interest in perpetuating the ancient superstitions handed down from former ages, and a system of faith which they learned in their childhood to regard as divine revelation. "Pre-historic archaeology shows that man, as first presented to our view, was a low, ignorant, brutal savage." Lenormant, in his Ancient History, (Vol. I. p. 25,) says: "To find the most ancient vestige of the existence and the industry of man, we must go back to that period which geologists call quarternary—the period immediately preceding the commencement of the present geological epoch. The arms and utensils of this premature age are, for the most part, pointed axes of flint, formed by breaking off large splinters. We can easily see that these flints, whose white coating proves their great antiquity, were intended to cut, to cleave, and to pierce. Some of these stones are scrapers, which were used, no doubt, to clean the inside of skins which the savages of the Stone Age used as a defense against the cold. We may even form a pretty correct idea of their mode of life. The cultivation of the soil and the domestication of animals were unknown. They wandered in the forest and inhabited natural caverns in the mountains. Every branch of the human race, without exception, has passed through the three stages of the "age of stone," and its traces have everywhere been proven. There is no necessary synchronism between these three stages in different parts of the world. The Stone Age is a period that cannot be chronologically determined, but a state of human progress which, in different countries, varied enormously in date. Entire populations have been discovered, who, at the close of the last century, and even in our own day, have not passed out of the Stone Age."

Learned geologists differ as to the number of thousand years that have passed since man's era on the earth; some have estimated the time at one hundred and fifty thousand years, while others place the time at a lower figure. There are few, who, judging from the fossilized human remains found in ancient caves and under deposits in the early formations, and from the wearing and changing in the beds of rivers since such deposits have taken place, think that not less than forty thousand years have rolled away since man has inhabited the earth. Lyell, Hitchcock, Dana, Denton and other distinguished geologists concur in this opinion.

Prof. Whitney, our American philologist, says: "Modern science is proving, by the most careful and exhaustive study of man and his works, that our race began its existence on earth at the bottom of the scale, instead of at the top, and has gradually been working upward; that human powers have had a history of development; that all the elements of culture—as the arts of life, art, science, language, religion, philosophy—have been wrought out by slow and painful efforts, in the conflict between the soul and mind of man on the one hand, and external motion on the other, a conflict in which man has, in favored races and under exceptional conditions of endowment and circumstance, been triumphantly the victor, and is still going on to new conquests. For ourselves, we heartily hold this latter view, deeming it to be established already on a firm basis, soon to be made impregnable."

Edward Clodd, an eminent English writer, in his "Childhood of the World," says: "Man was once wild, rough and savage, frightened at his own shadow, and still more at the roar of the thunder and the quiver of lightning, which he thought were the clapping of the wings and the flashing of the eyes of the angry spirit as he came flying from the sun."

There are several reasons for believing that man was once wild and naked, and that only by slow degrees did he become clothed and civilized. There have been found in Europe, Asia, Africa and America; but especially in Europe, thousands of tools and weapons used by savages now living in various parts of the earth, and among whom no traces of a past civilization can be found. One of the first things which man needed was some sharp-edged tool, harder than the thing he wished to cut. He knew nothing of the metals, and he therefore made use of the stones laying about. Men of science have given the name "Age of Stone," to that far off time when stone was used for weapons and implements. These oldest stone weapons have been chiefly found in places known as the "drift," and buried under ground and clay and stones, which have been drifted or carried down by rivers in their ceaseless flow. In those early days of man's history have wild animals shared Europe with him. There were mammoths, or woolly haired elephants, rhinoceroses, hippopotamuses; there were cave-lions, cave-bears, cave-hyenas, and other beasts of a much larger size than any found in the world at this day. That they lived at the same time man did, is certain; because under layers of earth their bones have been found side by side with his and with the weapons which he made. Year after year man learnt to shape his tools and weapons better, until really well-formed spear-heads, daggers, hatchets, hammers, and other implements were made, and at a far later date he had learnt the art of polishing them. The older age is called the "Old Stone Age," and the latter the "Newer Stone Age." The better shaped tools and weapons have been chiefly found in caves which were hollowed by water, ages before any living thing dwelt there. These caves were used by man, not only to live in, but also to bury their dead in; and from the different remains found in and near them, it is thought that feasts were held when the burials took place, and food and weapons were placed with the dead because their friends thought such things were needed by them as they traveled on their journey to the other world.

There is a large cavern in Brixham, on the south coast of Devonshire, which was discovered fourteen years ago through the falling in of a part of the roof. The floor is of stalagmite, or particles of lime, which have been brought down from the roof by the dropping of water, and became hardened into stone again. In this floor, which is about a foot in thickness, were found bones of the reindeer and cave-bear, while below it was a red loamy mass, fifteen feet thick in some parts, in which were buried flint flakes, or knives, and bones of the mammoth. Beneath this was a bed of gravel, more than twenty feet thick, in which flint flakes and small bones were found, including the bones of bears and woolly elephants. As it is known these flakes of flint were chipped by the hands of man, it is not hard to prove he lived in this country when those animals roamed over it.

You may ask, what proof have we that the bones of these creatures are so old? Apart from the fact that, for many centuries, no living mammoth has been seen, we have the finding of its bones buried at a goodly depth; and as it is certain no one would take the trouble to dig a grave to put them in, there must be some other cause for the mass of loam under which they are found. There are several ways by which the various bones may have got into the cave. The creatures to which they belonged may have died upon the hillside, and their bones may have washed into the cave; or they may have sought refuge, or what in the case I am now describing, seems most likely, lived therein; but, be this as it may, we have to account for the thirty-five feet of loam and gravel in which their remains are buried. The agent that thus covered them from view for long, long years, is that active tool of nature, which, before the day when no living thing was upon the earth, and ever since, has been cutting through rocks, opening the deep valleys, shaping the highest mountains, hollowing out the lowest caverns, and which is carrying the soil from one place to another to form new lands where now the deep sea rolls. It is water which carried that deposit into Brixham cavern and covered the bones, and which, since the days that mammoth, and bear, and reindeer lived in Devonshire, has scooped out the surrounding valleys one hundred feet deeper. And although the time which water takes to deepen a channel, or eat out a cavern, depends upon the speed with which it flows, you may judge that the quickest stream works slowly to those who watch it, when I tell you that the river Thames, flowing at its present rate, takes 11,470 years to scoop out its valley one foot in depth lower. Men of science have, therefore, some reason for believing that the flint weapons were made by men who lived many thousands of years ago. Science is thus teaching us the great age of the earth, and the great antiquity of the human race upon it.

These great facts are very damaging to current theological dogmas, and pointedly disagree with the teachings of a pseudo revelation. In matters of this kind, however, science is the arbiter which the world will accept, and it is in vain for the adherents of obsolete theories to attempt to push her aside. It being, however, our present purpose to look a little after the Devil, we will waive a further consideration of the subject at present.

As mankind made further advances in the domain of intelligence and reason, he also accepted wider views of the good and bad principles in nature; and different nations elaborated settled opinions as to the nature of evil. Thus the theologies and the mythologies of the olden times gradually emerged from the primitive, crude mental condition of the race. We will briefly glance at some of the more prominent nationalities and their evil deities and devils.

In India, that cradle-land of theology and religious superstition, was gotten up thousands of years ago, a trinity, consisting of Brahma, Vishnou and Siva—the Creator, the Preserver, and the Destroyer. The third personage in this trinity, if not really a devil, was the destructive element and the cause of death and disorganization. It is needless to say here, that this trinity was believed in long anterior to the one adopted in connection with the Jewish God, known as the Christian trinity, but such is the fact.

The Hindoos also believed in a "legion of Evil Spirits, called Rakshasas, who had a prince named Ravana; also in numerous classes of good and evil spirits, called Sooras and Assooras, which they believed to be step-brothers in perpetual hostility, to illustrate the supposed antagonism between spirit and matter. Wicked spirits were generally described as giants, and were often said to have a great serpent for their leader. They were continually aiming to do injury to mankind, and fought desperate battles with Indra and his Spirits of Light. They would have taken his Paradise by storm, and subverted the whole order of the Universe, if Brahma had not sent Vishnou to circumvent their plans. To perform this mission successfully, he assumed various forms at different times, and was twice incarnated in a human body and dwelt among mortals"—another instance, showing that a later mythology was able to appropriate an idea, however fallacious its origin.

The worshippers of Siva believed he had numerous wives according to his various titles in the multifarious departments of distinction or change. Under the name of Iswaras he was wedded to Isa, supposed to represent Nature, which, in all languages, is metaphorically called she. As changer of the seasons and promoter of germination, he was united to Parvati, Goddess of Illusions and Enchantments. As Time, the Destroyer, his mate was the dark goddess, Kali, with four hands full of deadly weapons, a necklace of human skulls, and a girdle of slaughtered giant's hands. Thus, like the numerous gods and devils who have succeeded him, we see he had a special fondness for females.

There was early in India a universal belief in evil spirits of various ranks and degrees of power, from gigantic demons, who attack the orbs of light, down to the malicious little Pucks who delight in small mischief. These were supposed to enter the minds of men, producing bad thoughts and criminal actions, and also to take possession of the body, producing insanity, fits and all manner of diseases. It was supposed they could be cast out only by some form of holy words, pronounced by a priest, with duly prescribed ceremonies.

The Egyptians, vying in antiquity with the Hindus, had also their evil spirit or devil. His name was Typho, and he was the brother of the god Osiris, who was for a long time the principal deity of that ancient nation of literature, theology and art.

It is not a little curious that, in all the mythologies of the world, the god and the devil have been closely connected by the ties of consanguinity. In India the creating and destroying principles were united in the same personage. In Egypt the beneficent and destructive gods were twin-brothers. In Persia, Ormuzd, the King of Light, and Ahriman or Ahrimanes, the Prince of Darkness, both emanated from the Eternal One. In the Grecian and Roman mythologies, Pluto was the son of a god, as were also Vulcan and Pan. In the Christian mythology, the Devil, if not the offspring of God, was of his direct creation, an honorable member of his household, and was for a long time on the most intimate terms with him.

In the ancient Persian mythology, the evil spirit, Ahriman, became jealous of the first-born. In consequence of his pride and envy, the Eternal One condemned him to remain three thousand years in the dark realm of shadows, where no ray of light could penetrate. During this time Ormuzd created the firmament, the heavenly orbs and the celestial spirits without the knowledge of his unfortunate brother Ahriman. When the latter had served out his time in darkness and returned, the dazzling beauty revived his old feeling of envy, and he resolved to compete with Ormuzd in everything. He created seven spirits, called arch-devs, in opposition to an equal number of good spirits in the service of Ormuzd, and placed them on the seven planets to substitute evil in place of good. He also created twenty-eight spirits, called Devs, to counteract the good Izeds, by spreading all manner of disorder and distress. The most powerful and pernicious of these was an impure serpent, with two feet, named Ashmogh. He subsequently produced a crowd of genii to oppose the beneficent work of the Fervers, the good angels in the employ of Ormuzd. Thus the contest became violent and continued.

Ormuzd, to arrest the increase of evil, made an egg containing kindly spirits, and Ahriman, to equal him, made one containing evil spirits, and then break them together, thus liberating the good and bad spirits to engage in eternal conflict. Ahriman also made the wolves and tigers, and serpents and venomous insects to annoy the good. By eating a certain kind of fruit, he transformed himself into a serpent and went gliding upon the earth to tempt human beings. His devils entered the bodies of men and women and produced all manner of diseases, and also sensuality, falsehood, slander and revenge. Into every part of the world they introduced discord and death. When Ormuzd tried to lead his hosts against Ahriman, they deserted him and joined the enemy, thus enabling evil to gain and hold the ascendancy on the earth for three thousand years.

Here we see a very fair prototype for the later ideas of devilology which prevailed in the world, and the word Dev only needed the addition of two letters to give us our own illustrious Devil.

In the Grecian and Roman mythology, the powers of evil were not concentrated in one individual, but the honors were divided among a number. Hades or Pluto reigned in a dismal, subterranean, sulphureous region, and wore a stern, gloomy countenance, and presided over deaths and funerals. He was so much of a monster no one of the goddesses was willing to take him for a partner, so one fine day he stole upon earth and kidnapped the beautiful Proserpine, carried her off in his chariot to hell and forced her to become his wife and the queen of the infernal regions.

The Fates and Furies were attendants upon Pluto, and assisted him in the diabolical business he had in hand. Charon was an old decrepit, long-bearded fellow, and was the ferryman of hell. He waited patiently to carry over the souls of the dead, which came flocking to him promiscuously and in troops, but was particular to collect the fare from each. The monsters at the entrance of hell were those fatal evils which bring destruction and death upon mankind, and by which the inhabitants of the infernal regions were constantly augmented; these evils were care, sorrow, disease, old age, fright, famine, want, labor, sting of conscience, fire, fraud, strife, war, and death. Cerberus must not be forgotten; he was a dog with three heads, and whose body was covered in a terrible manner with snakes instead of hair. He was the porter of hell and was begotten by Typhon.

Of the heathen nations and pagan systems of religions, all had their devils and evil spirits. But we must not dwell too long upon the devils of heathenism; our principal business is with the Devil of the Christian mythology, and to him we must now pay our particular respects. We must not suffer the ideal devils of olden times to deprive this equally mythical character of his due share of attention.

As every principal system of religion has found a necessity for a Devil, as an adversary and an antagonist to the all-ruling power of good, so Christianity must needs follow suit, and it was perhaps, fortunate for the founders of the system, that inasmuch as their original inventive powers seemed not to be of the highest order, that they were able to find plenty of models of devils already at hand, as well as all the other pagan dogmas of which the Christian system is composed and which they so freely appropriated.

The Hebrews had a very indefinite idea of the Devil, and Moses himself threw but a small amount of light upon this dark subject. Is it not a little curious that the word Devil is not mentioned once in the Jewish Bible. The word Devils is used four times (Lev. xvii. 7. Deut. xxxii. 17. 2 Chron. xi. 15. and Ps. cvi. 37. but means simply evil spirits or idols, and not the old archfiend, and eternal adversary of the Almighty who was especially discovered after the Old Testament was written and of which Christians are in such perpetual terror.

It is an important fact also that the name "Satan," another prominent name for the Devil, is used but five times in the Old Testament—twice in the book of Job, once in 1 Chron. xxi. 1, in Ps. cvi. 6, and Zach. iii. 9. Except in Job, neither passage alludes to the Christian Devil, but simply implies an adversary and not a personal being. The first is the meaning of the original Hebrew word. In Chronicles it says Satan provoked David to number the people. In narrating the same occurrence in Kings, an earlier history, it says: "God moved him to number the people," so as both passages must be true, it follows that both beings are one, and that at all events, it was not the Christian Devil that was meant.

Before we proceed farther in this interesting history, it will perhaps be well to give the various names by which his Infernal Highness is known, so that there may be no possible doubt as to whom we have under consideration. Among the titles accorded in the Bible to this distinguished personage are, Serpent, The Old Serpent, Satan, Devil, Lying Spirit, Lucifer, Son of the Morning, Prince of Darkness, Prince of the Power of the Air, The Adversary, The Tempter, The Accuser, Angel of the Bottomless Pit, Angel of Light, Mammon, Beelzebub, The Enemy, The Evil One, Legion, The Foul Spirit, The Unclean Spirit, The God of this World, The Great Red Dragon, Abaddon, Apollyon, The Destroyer, etc., etc. In outside circles he has a few additional names, some of which occur to us at this moment, and we will mention them. Zamiel, The Archfiend, Asmodeus, Mephistopheles, His Satanic Majesty, Old Nick, Old Split-foot, The Old Gentleman, The Old Scratch, The Deuce, The Dickens, Old Horny, Old Harry, Prince of Brimstone, King of the Nether Regions, The Old Boy, etc., etc. Here is certainly an array of names quite sufficient for one poor Devil, and if he could get anything for them, he might sell a score or two of them and have plenty left.

His Imperial Lowness is first introduced to us in the Bible story in the Garden of Eden, as a precocious snake who could stand erect on the tip of his tail and talk human language so artistically as to persuade, in about fifteen minutes, the most perfect woman that ever breathed, and right fresh from the hands of her maker, to eat a fine looking specimen of apple from the workshop of the same workman, but under whose fair skin there was poison and damnation enough to perpetually curse countless millions of human beings who for thousands of years succeeded her. That was indeed a villainous but cunning old snake to thus completely thwart the King of Heaven, the Eternal God, of all knowledge and power, and the Maker and Ruler of Heaven and Earth; and it was a most pernicious and deadly kind of fruit that could, by simply being masticated by our grandmother, thus inexorably damn to hopeless, perpetual and excruciating torture countless quintillions of her offspring. Why did God ever make such a snake? Why did he ever make such an apple? Why did he ever make such a woman? Why should he have created the possibilities for such a terrible catastrophe? How could he have made such an egregious blunder? Who is able to answer these momentous questions? It is a painful subject to dwell upon, and let us leave it at once.

There is consolation in knowing (though it is rather inadequate to the occasion) that the old serpent who thus defeated God, and ruined the world by one master-stroke of cunning, was condemned to crawl on his belly, to eat dust, and to have the organs of speech taken from him. And we are glad to be able to state to you on this occasion that the old serpent has never stood on his tail nor spoken a word since he performed that apple trick. We fear, however, he has not observed the sentence about eating dust. No naturalist, no snake hunter, nor snake charmer has in these six thousand years ever caught a snake eating dust, but they have frequently been detected in swallowing frogs, toads, mice, birds, etc., and it has been observed, too, that this villainous beast always insists upon taking his food alive. We would be willing to sign a petition to the high court of heaven that this vile enemy of God and man be made to abide by the original sentence and eat nothing but dust.

Some have had the audacity, or the hardihood, to doubt whether this snake that so early engaged in the apple business and thus cornered the market, was identically the same Devil who afterwards entered into a speculation with God in the matter of Job, the putting of his children to death, killing off all his live stock and covering him from head to foot with the most terrible boils that was ever heard of, and the same muscular Devil, who, on a later occasion transported the Son of God to the top of a very high mountain and also to the highest pinnacle of the temple; but our reliable, disinterested clergymen, who were better posted in all matters pertaining to the Devil, than any of the rest of us, assure us in the most unmistakable manner that such is the fact, and we are not at liberty to doubt them.

It is to be regretted that, though the devilish snake was doomed to crawl on the face of the earth and not to speak a loud word from that time forth, still matters did not move smoothly between God and man. Although the serpent was placed at such great disadvantage, he seemed to still have power enough to pervert the whole human race and to alienate them from God to such a degree, that he got very sick of the enterprise and heartily wished he had never undertaken it. He saw no way out of the muddle he had gotten into, except to drown the entire human race and all the animal kingdom, save the fishes and one man and his family. These were heroic measures, truly, but the case was desperate. Mankind was rapidly going to the Devil any way, and he decided to send them all by water.

It must have been an interesting sight to those old antediluvians who had lived to the mature age of nine hundred years and over, to see the animals gathering from all quarters of the earth, of however diverse nature and characteristics, fling into the Ark two by two, wolves and lambs, tigers and kids, hawks and chickens, turkeys and grasshoppers, all in the most fraternal and amicable manner, disposing of themselves in the Ark and stowing themselves away like cord-wood, and waiting for God to shut them in, in pitch darkness, there to remain some thirteen months. It is presumable the serpent or the Devil—whichever he may have been—was shrewd enough to get into the ark before the door was closed, for we see that the serpent still lives and that the Devil has been in a flourishing condition ever since.

Could he have been drowned beyond all power of resuscitation, we could have been better reconciled to the merciless drowning of the lambs, the kittens, the fawns, the cows, the horses, the camels, the Guinea-pigs, the squirrels, the larks, the mocking-birds, the bob-o-links, the honey-bees and the butterflies, none of which had done any wrong, so far as we are informed; had the Devil been drowned, we could have submitted to the necessary loss of life on the other hand; but to realize that they were all drowned, and he kept alive, excites our extreme indignation.

It is to be further regretted, that this immense outlay of life and treasure resulted in so little benefit to either God or man, for we expressly informed that the world went on just as bad after, as before. The Devil still ruled the hearts of men, thus showing himself, as he has on many other occasions, the smarter of the two.

Although very little is said of the Devil for some hundreds of years after that extensive freshet, we are not to suppose he was asleep or idle. He is said ever to be on the alert, and to let no opportunity pass where he can "turn an honest penny," or to do any little job in his line of business. Judging from the history of the events occurring between the flood and Job's time, and the amount of butchery and killing and the various other crimes committed by God's peculiar people, as well as the rest of the world, we may well suppose he was steadily improving the golden moments as they passed.

Under the name of Satan, the Devil is prominently brought to our notice in the book of Job, and he is there represented as a very respectable gentleman—vastly improved in character and circumstances from the time, when in the garden of Eden he was cursed to crawl upon his belly all the days of his life. At the time of that cursing, it may be supposed God had the utmost contempt for him, and despised him above all living beings; but when he is introduced to us in Job, there seems to be great cordiality between the two, we are led to suppose that the Devil was the Son of God, or at least a close and intimate friend. On "a day when the children of God came to present themselves before the Lord, that Satan came also among them" (Job. i. 6). The Lord saluted him in a friendly manner, and asked him whence he came. Satan answered: "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." Then the Lord asked him: "Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil?" Satan answered this question in a true Yankee fashion, by asking another: "Dost Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made a hedge about him, about his house, and about all that he has on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. Put forth thy hand now and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face." To this banter the Lord, with much magnanimity towards the Devil, (more, surely, than to the good man Job,) said: "Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thy hand." Upon this Satan took his leave, to enter upon the work of depriving the good man of his wealth, according to God's suggestion.

This interview and conversation between God and the Devil suggests a few thoughts. First. As to the sons of God: who were they? Where did they come from? How many sons had he? Who were their mothers? Were they legitimate or illegitimate? What was their occupation? Where did they go to? Were they divine or human, or half and half? Was Satan one of them? Where are they at the present time?

Second. How is it that the Lord, who is omniscient and sees and knows all things, should be under the necessity of asking the Devil where he came from? Is he not expected to know where everybody is at all times, especially his arch-enemy, who is constantly working against him? If God is everywhere present, and his all-seeing eye is always open, how is it, if Satan was constantly walking up and down the earth, that God did not sometimes meet him? It would seem that Satan was an excellent traveler, and was looking after the affairs of men better than God was.

Third. While it must be set down as rather of a cruel and dishonorable business for God and the Devil to thus plot against a righteous man like Job who had discharged his duty in all respects, that from the account, the ignominy and dishonor of the transaction attaches equally to the two; in fact, God would seem to be the most culpable, for it was he who first called the Devil's attention to the man Job, and it was he who commissioned the Devil to despoil him.

Fourth. It is painful to read the account that follows; how thoroughly Satan executed the commission he had received, and how the heart of good old Job was made sore by the loss of his oxen, his sheep, his camels, his servants, and finally his sons and daughters. It is no wonder that in his great grief he arose and tore his mantle. Had he torn it into shreds, no one could have blamed him. But he endured it all manfully, and neither cursed nor blamed. It would seem that even the Devil's heart ought to have been touched by the good old man's afflictions, and the noble resignation with which he bore them, that he would have ceased his persecutions. We must say in all the foul deeds that are laid to the Devil, this is really the meanest of any that is proved against him. Such ignoble conduct cannot be excused even in a devil. We must remember however, that God had given his consent to it all, and knew all about it. Whatever dishonor the Devil gained in that nefarious business, God must share with him.

It seems, further along, that the sons of God came together to hold another re-union and Satan came also to present himself before the Lord as before, when God and he had another conversation about the afflicted Job. God asked him again where he came from and received the same answer as before. He asked the Devil again what he thought of Job, and admitted that the Devil had induced him to bring afflictions upon the poor old man without the slightest cause. The Devil's answer was much as before; "Skin for skin; yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. Put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh and he will curse thee to thy face." Then said God, "Behold, he is in thy hand; but save his life." He virtually said, do what you please with the old man; afflict him and torment him as much as you like, so that you don't quite take his life. Upon this the Devil again took his departure to carry out this new commission. Then follows the recital of the bodily sufferings that were visited upon that patient, good man in the shape of boils all over his body from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet.

Any person who has had a good sized boil on any part of the body, well knows the sufferings it produces. No boil has ever yet found the right place to locate to be out of the way. One boil has always been found sufficient at a time; we never saw a person who wished two at once. One was quite all he wished to attend to. But think of a poor victim being covered, all over from head to foot. Just think of the intense pain and anguish they must produce when coming to a head; and when they got to running what a time the poor man must have had. We pity him now, from the bottom of our heart. Of all the sufferings poor mortals have ever been afflicted with, we can imagine nothing worse; and to be kept up so long. O, Dear! it is a painful subject and we cannot dwell upon it longer. How a decent Devil or a good God could stand by and thus wantonly afflict a poor, hapless mortal, has always been a mystery to us. For the credit and good name of God and the Devil both, we have always wished that the picture here presented was overdrawn. We would much rather that the writer of the drama or story had misstated the facts, than to think them truly given. If it is a fact that the whole human family are in the hands of such a God and such a Devil, we would call upon the angels to pity and weep.

After this discreditable piece of business but little is said about the Devil in the older part of the Bible.

Although God's chosen people seemed at all times to be very full of the Devil, his name is seldom mentioned till we reach the New Testament, and then the Devil is served up in almost every conceivable style. At one time he tempts God, or the Son of God—as you choose—another time he takes him to the pinnacle of the temple; again he conveys him to the top of a very high mountain where he shows him all the kingdoms on both sides of the globe; (we have thought no one but a Devil could perform this difficult feat); then he gets into a great many different persons; one was the wild man among the tombs. If the imp was big enough and strong enough to carry a god or a man around it would seem singular how he could get into a person. In the wild man alluded to, he seems to have entered very extensively, for when he came out there was enough of him to occupy two thousand swine. Whether there were two thousand of the devils that got into the man, or whether he divided up into two thousand parts when he entered the swine has not yet been settled. Seven of him, or seven of some devils, seem to have got into Mary Magdalene, but how they could make themselves comfortable in such a locality is a little mysterious. Jesus, however, made them come out; in fact he made short work of dislodging devils. If he possessed such power over them it seems very strange why he did not utterly demolish them, destroy them, or any way to get rid of them.

If Jesus left his bright, happy home in heaven to come down to this gloomy world of ours to make human beings happy, why did he not with one blow, kill the Devil, the cause of all the evil and trouble the world has ever known? This would have been a work worthy of a God indeed, and vastly more effective than simply dying on the cross. If, however, God wished to have a Devil in the first place, and saw fit to make him, he probably has his reasons for preserving his life.

It is a debatable question whether the Devil is not a very serviceable being to God, and whether there is not a kind of partnership between them. In the case of Job, they seemed to operate in a joint interest and by mutual consent. In the interviews between Jesus and the Devil, there seemed to be no marked ill-will. They passed considerable time in each other's society. In fact, is not the Devil a very important factor in the grand scheme of salvation and in eternal punishment, which Christ taught, and which he came to inaugurate? His giving up his life as an atonement for the world, is said to be the most sublime and god-like act ever performed; but how could it have been played without the Devil? Who else but the Devil could have incited Herod, the High Priests, Pontius Pilate, and the Roman soldiers, to perform their essential parts? Who but he could have inspired Judas? Without the Devil and Judas, how could the grand work have been accomplished?

Is not the Devil entitled to a very large share of gratitude from the human family, for the indispensable part he performed in this grandest and sublimest scheme of salvation which God or man ever devised—if it is of such a character?

Is not the Devil also most essential to God in other directions? In God's divine and benevolent scheme of punishing his poor, fallible creatures to the latest moments of eternity for misbehaving or misbelieving, who could carry out his kind intentions so faithfully as the Devil? What other being could be induced to attend to the nether regions of fire and brimstone, remaining patiently in that super-heated locality to pitch and punch into the burning lake, for unknown millions of years, countless billions of poor human wretches who had no hand in bringing themselves into existence?

Who else but the Devil could be found who would carry out and execute so fully, God's beneficent and deific designs in this direction? It would seem that God is under a debt of gratitude to the Prince of Brimstone, that he can never fully repay. It would seem to be wrong in any one, to seek to defraud the Devil out of the honors, emoluments or profits, resulting to the firm, of which he is so distinguished a member.

In view of all this, we are sometimes sadly pained to hear his August Highness, (or lowness) so berated and abused, as he frequently is, by those who count themselves special servants of God. There never was an unfortunate being so slandered, maligned and vilified on all occasions and in all places, as this same Devil. He is accused of doing, or inciting every cruel, ignoble criminal, low, mean, dirty act, that has ever been committed by God or man. He is denounced in the most vehement terms, as the great and persistent enemy to God and all that is good. It is laid to his charge that he is constantly lying in ambush, seeking to waylay, seduce, entice, and then destroy every son and daughter of humanity. It would require volumes to contain a title of the numerous and reiterated indictments of this kind that have daily and hourly been brought against the poor Devil, by clergymen, and other pious, godly persons. The charges are grave, but are they true?

Let us spend a moment in looking up his record, to see if it bears out these terrible charges. He has, times without number, been denounced as a liar, and has a million times been called the "father of liars." Is it so? Has he been such an inveterate liar? When did he lie so much? When did he lie at all? It has been charged upon him by many thousands of divines, that he lied to our poor old grandmother Eve, in that little affair about the apple; but was it so? God told Adam, that on the day he ate of the fruit, he should surely die, but the Devil came along in the convenient and fascinating form of a snake, and told Eve that though she ate of the fruit, she should not surely die; but her eyes should be opened; and she should be as gods, knowing good and evil. Well, Eve and her "old man" ate of the fruit, and they did not die that day, but lived nine hundred years afterwards; and their eyes were opened, so they discovered their nakedness which they had not before ascertained. When the Lord came down, in the cool of the day, to walk in the garden, and discovered man had got his eyes open he became very angry and stated the matter thus: "Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil, and now lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and eat and live forever;" therefore the Lord in his anger turned him out of the garden, and made him go to work for a living. Now, who lied in this business? If there was a lie out, who told it? It seems God's anger was aroused, not because man was to die on the day that he ate the apple, but that his eyes had become opened to know good and evil, and his fears were excited lest he should eat of the tree of life and thus live forever. Who, we ask, told the lie? It surely was not the Devil. Every word he said was strictly true.

We stand here now to defend the Devil against the base charges that have been so persistently made against him, and we fearlessly assert that it cannot be proven that he has ever told a lie from the time of the apple, till now; and we assert, too, that there is not a priest on the face of the earth, can show that he has. An unfair effort has been made to prove him guilty of a lie at the time he took Jesus up on that high mountain and showed him all the kingdoms of the earth, and offered them to him, if he would worship him; but there was no lie in the matter; he did not say anything that was false. He simply offered the kingdoms aforesaid to Jesus, upon certain conditions. It is claimed that he proposed to give to Jesus what did not belong to him. Another error; there was a flaw in the title. In one place it says: "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," and in another, the Devil is called "the prince of this world," implying that he also had just claims to the property; and besides, according to the rules of war and the laws of nations, the earth belonged to him by virtue of conquest; and when he had so long had undisputed possession of it, he would at least, seem to have acquired title enough, at all events, to execute a quit-claim deed; and we have no authority to suppose he intended to do anything more. So another charge, that the Devil lied, proves to be itself a lie. Now let some one show when he absolutely did lie. It is easy to call him a liar, but let it be proved, if it is true. It can't be done. But with his antagonist, we are sorry to say, it is otherwise; for in his own word he admits he sent lying spirits and put lying words in the mouths of his prophets to deceive a king, and very numerous cases can be cited where he made misrepresentations, and where he also made promises that were never performed. Who, then, we ask again, is the liar?

The Devil is also grossly charged with malice, cruelty and great injustice to the human race; but we raise our voice on this occasion and say these charges are false—basely false. He has never stolen, he has never robbed, he has never murdered, and we defy any clergyman in the land to show that he has. His opponent, of whom it is claimed, he is all goodness and excellence, very frequently sent his people out on stealing and robbing expeditions; and there would be no trouble in citing many scores of cases where God authorized his chosen ones to despoil their neighbors and take away, forcibly, or by deception their most valuable property, and many times while doing this, to slay, murder and slaughter countless thousands of men, women and children. It will be easy to show by God's own book where he has taken the lives of almost countless thousands of human beings, and often upon the most trivial pretexts, sometimes 5,000, 10,000, 20,000, 50,000, 70,000, and, yes, 670,000 at a time, as with Pharaoh and his hosts in the Red Sea; but we assert here to-day, and without fear of contradiction, that the Devil, with all the power that has been assigned to him to defeat God and to rule the entire world, has never taken the life of a single human being. (Here is a striking contrast, indeed!)

On the other hand he has shown himself to be a true friend to the human race in innumerable instances. At the start, in the garden, as we have just seen, his object was to do our first parents a favor—to open their eyes to discern good and evil—to give them knowledge, and for this very reason God was angry. And, if we can take the words of priests, bishops and divines in all ages of Christendom as true, the Devil has been the source of knowledge, intelligence, education, science, inventions and all the improvements in the arts and mechanics that the world has made. We have no account of God's ever teaching any science to man—neither astronomy, geology, chemistry, mathematics, natural history or philosophy. And when he incarnated himself and lived thirty years in that condition on the earth, did he teach a single science? Did he get up a single new invention? Did he teach the alphabet even to a single child? Did he open a school anywhere, or write a book or a letter? We have no account that he did.

But how is it in this respect with the Devil? Why, he has been credited by Christians themselves, as being the originator and foster-father of all the education and knowledge the world has to-day. When Copernicus and Galileo discovered that the earth is a round ball, that it revolves upon its own axis every twenty-four hours, and that it courses round the sun every three hundred and sixty-five days—facts which every schoolboy now understands—the highest Christian authorities in the world denounced it as the work of the Devil, and Martin Luther, even called Copernicus an “old fool” for making such a statement. Those Christians knew that neither God nor his Son, nor his prophets, nor his priests knew anything about these things, and had never said a word about them, and they very naturally concluded that this knowledge came from the Devil, and for this reason they persecuted those early scientists, and sought their lives; they either drove them from their country or shut them up in the Inquisition and tortured them till one of them—Galileo—was compelled to denounce the great truths he had uttered; but the old man, though he soon died, was able to reiterate the grand discoveries he had made.

The art of printing, too, has been attributed to the Devil, time and time again. Gutenberg and Faust, when they invented the art, were denounced as being in league with him. Leading bishops and priests of the Christian Church but a few centuries ago, did all they could to suppress and keep back the art of printing. They saw in it the facilities for conveying intelligence to the masses, and that it was calculated to lessen their hold upon them, and hence they fought it bitterly. They knew that God, neither direct, nor through any special agents, priests or prophets, ever did a thing or said a word about the printing press, and it was very easy for them to come to the conclusion that it was the work of the Devil.

In the same way all the succeeding inventions, innovations and discoveries that have been made, have successively been attributed to the Devil. In this category may be mentioned the steam engine, lightning rods, the telegraph, rail roads, reaping machines, sewing machines, friction matches, and thousands of other inventions, that have been denounced as the Devil's contrivances. Even the pious Christians in Scotland, persistently fought the use of the fanning mill for cleaning their oats, their rye and their beans, because it was the Devil's wind, and they would have nothing to do with it. These godly souls well knew that their Deity, and all of his self-constituted servants had never brought any of these inventions to the knowledge of men, and they knew not who else to attribute them to, save the Devil. If he is the author of all the grand improvements, inventions and sciences, the world owes him vastly more than it will ever be able to pay.

In the matter of good nature, equanimity of temper, geniality and kindness, the Devil compares most favorably with his competitor aforesaid; while God from time immemorial, has evinced striking traits of passion, anger, changeableness, irascibility, malice, revenge, ferocity, vindictiveness, fickleness, falseness, and all the accompanying traits, the Devil has been remarkably free from them all. We have no authentic account of his ever getting mad, of his flying into a rage, of his showing malice, of his being vindictive or cruel, of his ever hurting any body; or in short, of his being guilty of any conduct unbecoming a well-disposed, good-natured, genial, gentlemanly Devil.

On the ground of sexual excesses, we think we can point to the Devil with a great amount of pride. In this direction he has certainly acquitted himself with a great deal of credit. If he has had his little weaknesses in this direction, he has also had the good sense, or the shrewdness to not be caught at it, and he has not landed his exploits in this line, abroad. While God has had numerous sons, who came together from different parts of the world, though it is not known who their mothers were or that he ever was married or had a wife; though he held clandestine sexual intercourse with a young, dark-haired, modest Jewess, and though he directed his servants on many occasions to engage in the sexual relation, and through his servants, the prophets, the popes, the cardinals, the bishops, the priests, elders, preachers and ministers of all stripes and sects, have distinguished themselves in a remarkable degree, in this illicit business; we are proud to say that there is not a single instance where any such conduct can be proved upon the Devil. So far as can be shown, he has been a paragon of virtue and continence. O, dear! if there could have been less god, and more devil in the world, how much better it would have been for the human race, and how many criminal and “dirty scrapes,” it would have saved our pious clergymen, who, right round here among us, and in every direction in which we turn our eyes, in all parts of the country, are so often dragged down in disgrace and are compelled to defend themselves in courts of justice and at a heavy expense, against the well-proven charges of sexual sins. How much better too, it would be for the younger sisters in the Church, and the bewitching damsels in every department of life.

Yet this amiable, virtuous Devil is still abused, belied and vilified by those who in the scale of morality and purity of character are far beneath him. They still accuse him of every crime in the calendar when it cannot be shown that he has ever committed a single one of them. Herein the benignity and great excellence of his character is strikingly manifested; “though he was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth,” and who, “when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered threatened not.” For this reason we feel that it is incumbent upon us to stand up here before you and say a word in his defense. He is too modest, or too peaceful, or too much in favor of the policy of silence to strike back when he is smitten, even to uphold his own innocence. Can it be possible that a being possessing these remarkable characteristics is really so bad as he is represented by his maligners, and the source of all the wrongs and evils in existence?

In point of ability, shrewdness, generalship, power and success he also compares most favorably with his author and maker. Take into consideration that the Devil was only a creature of the Creator, to begin with, that he labored under the great disadvantage of commencing business as a snake; that he was subjected to extreme ignominy and degradation, that he has ever been hated, shunned and despised, that he had an Almighty God for a competitor, and it must be admitted that he has held his own in the world remarkably well.

After he was cursed, some six thousand years ago to perpetually crawl on his belly and eat dust, it was but a few generations before he had the entire world of mankind under his control, with the exception of a very small number. So full and general had his power become that his antagonist, in order to gain an advantage over him, resorted to the terrible necessity of drowning the whole world. This expedient, however, seemed to cripple the Devil in a very slight degree; his rule in the earth was soon as powerful as ever, and for thousands of years he was able to trouble his antagonist excessively.

To such a strait was God driven through the machinations of this enterprising and industrious Devil, and so great was the danger that the whole world would follow after him, and be utterly lost to its maker, he was at length compelled to come down from heaven and be incarnated—a human being for thirty years and then die ignominiously on the cross. Notwithstanding this, and the fact that for eighteen hundred years he has had a great number of priests of all kinds and qualities, to assist him in fighting the Devil, and though the most severe measures—the stake, the scaffold, the beheading-axe and block, the rack, the torture-wheel and hundreds of other pious and cruel inventions for inflicting pain and taking life, to say nothing of long continued and desolating Christian wars, the Devil has kept right along in the even tenor of his way, constantly gaining upon his antagonist and bringing the world more and more under his influence and control.

If success is the measure of power, the Devil must be set down as far more powerful than his opponent, for in taking the whole world together he has twenty faithful followers, where God has one; and any Christian clergyman will tell you that nearly the whole world is to-day led by his Satanic Majesty. That he is smart, powerful and great, who can for a moment doubt?

It is amusing to observe the different ways in which the Devil is pictured and presented to mankind, and how many forms he is made to assume. The Bible picture, as we have seen, is quite varied—sometimes a snake, sometimes a noble, manly fellow, who congregated with the sons of God, and held friendly converse with God himself; and sometimes an imp of darkness, sneaking around to crawl into some unfortunate human being; sometimes a muscular athlete, capable of carrying a God through the air and transporting him from place to place; sometimes a hideous monster with the skin of a goat, horns on his head, a cloven foot and a long tail; sometimes an affable, pleasant, engaging gentleman, and sometimes a red fiery dragon of hideous mien.

Milton saw him as a tall, majestic, imperious personage, possessing dignity, eloquence and a massive intellect. He thus describes him, after his expulsion from heaven, as he lay prostrate upon the surface of the burning lake, as he just began to recover from the stunning shock of his tremendous fall, and had been holding converse with his fellows:

“He scarce had ceased, when the superior fiend
Was moving towards the shore; his ponderous shield,
Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast; the broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening from the top of Fesole,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands,
Rivers, or mountains, on her spotty globe.
His spear, (to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great Admiral, were but a wand.)
He walked with, to support uneasy steps
Over the burning marle (not like those Steps on heaven's azure!) and the torrid clime Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire.”

To arouse his fallen and stupified companions to life and action, he thus addressed them:

“Princes, Potentates,
Warriors, the flower of heaven! once yours, now lost,

If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal spirits; or have ye chosen this place
After the toil of battle to repose
Your wearied virtue, for the ease you find
To slumber here, as in the vales of heaven?
Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
To adore the Conqueror? who now beholds
Cherub and Seraph rolling in the flood;
With scatter'd arms and ensigns; till anon
His swift pursuers from heaven's-gates discern
The advantage, and descending tread us down
Thus drooping; or with linked thunderbolts
Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf.
Awake, arise, or be forever fallen!”

Byron, in his poem, CAIN, makes Lucifer thus discourse to Cain:

“I tempt none,
Save with the truth; was not the tree, the tree
Of knowledge? and was not the tree of life
Still fruitful? Did I bid her pluck them not?
Did I plant things prohibited
Within the reach of beings innocent, and curious
By their own innocence? I would have made ye Gods; and even he who thrust ye forth, so thrust ye Because “ye should not eat the fruits of life,
And become gods as we.” Were those his words?

And again, he speaks as follows:

“No! by heaven, which he Holds, and the abyss, and the immensity
Of worlds and life, which I hold with him—No!
I have a victor—true; but no superior.
Homage he has from all—but none from me:
I battle it against him, as I battled
In highest heaven. Through all eternity,
On the unfathomable gulfs of Hades,
On the interminable realms of space,
And the infinity of the endless ages,
All, a I will I dispute! And world by world,
And star by star, and Universe by Universe,
Shall tremble in the balance, till the great
Conflict shall cease, if ever it shall cease,
Which it ne'er shall, till he or I be quenched!
And what can quench our immortality,
Of mutual and irrevocable hate?
He as a conqueror will call the conquered
Evil; but what will be the good he gives?
Were I the victor, his works would be deem'd
The only evil ones. And you, ye new
And scarce born mortals, what have been his gifts
To you already, in your little world?
CAIN.—But few: and some of those but bitter.

LUCIFER.— Back
With me, then, to thing earth, and try the rest
Of his celestial boons to you and yours.
Evil and good are things in their own essence.
And not made good or evil by the giver;
But if he gives you good—so call him; if Evil springs from him, do not name it mine—
Till ye know better its true fount; and judge
Not by words, though of spirits, but the fruits
Of your existence, such as it must be.
One good gift has the fatal apple given—
Your reason:—let it not be over-swayed
By tyrannous threats to force you into faith
'Gainst all external sense and inward feeling.
Think and endure,—and form an inner world
In your own bosom—where the outward fails;
So shall you nearer be the spiritual Nature, and war triumphant with your own.”

We would like to quote what other poets have said of the Devil, and what words they have put into his mouth, but time will not permit. We must hasten on. The Devil has truly been a most prolific theme in this world of ours, and in connection with his sulphurous abode, the cause of unutterable terror, anguish, grief and woe. No subject has been so much and so often discussed, and none has produced a greater amount of misery. Volumes have been written of him, and salaried priests have desecrated upon his nature and attributes, and millions of sermons and harrangues have been delivered, about the august personage under consideration. Our attention, within a few days, was called to a large number of antique books, in one of our Broadway bookstores, pertaining to the Devil, some of them being two and three hundred years old. So large was the list, that it was deemed necessary to issue a catalogue containing their titles and descriptions, and itself is a book of perhaps forty pages. Some of the works were written in a humorous and satirical vein, but the larger portion of them most serious, giving elaborately the character and maliciousness of his Sulphurous Majesty, and his connection with God's plans and purposes, not failing to portray the impending danger awaiting all who listen to him. Truly did Voltaire exclaim: “Never has there been a more universal empire than that of the Devil.”

Painters and picture-makers usually represent him as a horrid monster, with coarse, sardonic features, with mischief and malice depicted in his countenance; two horns upon his head, like a goat's; with a cloven hoof, like the same animal, but much larger, and with a tail much longer and larger than the goat can boast. He seems to have a great fondness for goat-meat, and all the goats in the world are consigned to his cus-today. That they finally do not appear among the goats, going down to his heated sulphurous regions, has been the terror and the agony of millions.

The goat idea in the make-up of the Devil was doubtless taken, in part, from the ancient Egyptian, Grecian and Roman earthly deity, Pan, who resembled a horned half-goat, and with cloven feet and the tail of a goat. He was also called Incubus, and his domain was the crude world—the earth. He was, however, full of music, and in this respect our Devil closely resembles him. It is highly probable the traditions and ideas of a Devil were borrowed from the ancient Chaldeans or Persians, in whose country the Jews were detained seventy years in captivity. Before their captivity, they had very slight ideas of the Devil, but after it the idea cropped out perceptibly, and was handed down with the dogmas of Judaism to the era of Christianity.

As so much has been written and preached by Christians about the Devil, it may be well to give a quotation or two from Christian authors concerning him and his sulphurous home. Dr. Watt's says:

"Far in the deep, where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.
Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
And darts to inflict immortal pains,
Dyed in the blood of damned souls.
There Satan, the first rebel, lies,
And roars and bites his iron bands;
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crushed with the weight of both thine hands."

We cannot envy the mind capable of imagining such a horrid picture. Here is another choice bit from the Rev. Dr. Sewell, of Oxford, in his "Christian Morals": "No sooner does the infant draw the vital air, than in consequence of it, being under the wrath of God, it is taken possession of by the Spirit of Evil."

We will hold, and realize and act upon the true, unfigurative, literal personality of a Spirit of Evil, tempting man, lying in wait for him, triumphing over him, hating him, going about seeking whom he may devour. On this main fact must rest the foundation of all Christian ethics."

Baxter, in his "Call to the Unconverted," draws some vivid pictures of the Devil and his miserable, fiery home. Our own, Jonathan Edwards, was also rich and voluminous in delineations of the Devil and the regions of the damned, but we must not enlarge in this direction. We will, however, give a single quotation from the "Course of Time," by that orthodox Christian, Pollock:

Wide was the place,
And deep as wide, and ruinous as deep.
Beneath I saw a lake of burning fire.
With tempest tossed perpetually, and still
The waves of fiery darkness, 'gainst the rocks
Of dark damnation broke, and music made
Of melancholly sort; and over head,
And all around, wind warred with wind, storm howled
To storm, and lightning, forked lightning, crossed,
And thunder answered thunder, muttering sounds
Of sullen wrath; and as far as sight could pierce,
Or down descend in caves of hopeless depth.
Through all that dungeon of unfading fire,
I saw most miserable beings walk,
Burning continually, yet unconsumed;
Forever wasting, yet enduring still:
Dying perpetually, yet never dead."

"O'er their heads a bowless cloud,
Of indignation hung; a cloud it was
Of thick and utter darkness, rolling, like
An ocean, tides of livid, pitchy flame;
With thunders charged, and lightnings ruinous,
And red with forked vengeance, such as wounds
The soul; and full of angry shapes of wrath,
And eddies whirling with tumultuous fire,
And forms of terror raving to and fro,
And monsters, unimagined heretofore
By guilty men in dreams before their death,
From horrid to more horrid changing still
In hideous movement through that stormy gulf."

Those who are fond of pictures of this kind can be pleased to their heart's content in the Christian theology of the past few centuries.

It is thought strange by many, why men of education and intelligence will continue to teach such monstrous ideas about a vindictive God, a malicious Devil, and a seething, foaming hell; but when the fact is borne in mind that in the words of the Rev. Dr. Sewell, already quoted, "On this main fact must rest the foundation of all Christian ethics," the reason can be understood. This is the base on which the structure of Christian theology is built—a vindictive God, angry with the whole human race, a villainous but subservient Devil in his employ, and a hell, of the description just given, to burn poor wretches in—and here you have the bulk of Christianity. This is the principal nourishment which these blatant and extra pious clergy for hundreds of years have been doling out to the simple children, small and large, who devoutly listen to them Sunday after Sunday, month after month and year after year.

These themes are their principal stock in trade.

How could the clergy get along without a Devil or a hell? The Devil is their best friend. It is to escape his clutches that induces millions of Christian dupes to support this idle, unproductive but privileged class of priests and bishops, enabling them to dress in fine linen and broadcloth; to eat the best the land affords, to live in splendid mansions of brown-stone and pressed brick; and all without lifting a finger or soiling their hands to earn a penny of the money which they cost. Were it not for this very convenient Devil who serves them so well, they would be under the necessity of turning their attention in other directions, and devising some other, but perhaps more laborious, means of obtaining a livelihood.

Do you realize, kind Friends, what the promulgation of the repulsive doctrines we have under consideration, has cost, and is costing the world? In our own country we have over sixty thousand priests, who with more or less fervor are preaching this kind of gospel, and as many churches in which it is listened to. This is done at an annual expense of $200,000,000. In Christendom there are not less than 300,000 priests of all kinds, who preach the Devil, and it costs the poor people who pay for this kind of amusement the enormous sum of $1,000,000,000 annually. Could not this amount of wealth be used where it would do vastly more good to the race? Is it so important that his Satanic Majesty should be held up in all his deformity before the trembling millions, that this amount of treasure, wrung from the weary muscles and the aching backs of the toiling, credulous masses, should year after year, and century after century, be worse than thrown away? Cannot some theme more pleasing and interesting than the Devil, with his hoofs, horns and tail, be delivered to the people?

It has doubtless been observed by the most of you, who are pious enough to attend Church, that his Satanic Majesty is, of late years, receiving the "cold shoulder" from the clergy, who have been so much indebted to him in the past. They say far less about the Devil now than twenty-five years ago; and they mix far less of sulphur in the gospel pap which they so affectionately feed to the babes of grace. The fact is the mental stomach of the public has become so sensitive that it rejects such highly seasoned diet as the wrath of God and brimstone make when duly blended together. It requires something milder, and we see the Doctors of Divinity, like the Doctors of Medicine, hasten to furnish their patients with such boluses and mixtures as they are willing to accept and pay for.

Clergymen, like other professionals and tradesmen, are very anxious to please their patrons, and are willing to furnish just such commodities as are in demand. They are getting to take a very sensible view of the matter, and virtually they talk to their customers in this wise: "We wish to please you; you pay us your money, and we desire you to have just what you want. If you do not like so much sulphur, we can just as easily give you less; in fact, we think we can soon dispense with it altogether. If you object to the Devil, we will keep him behind the curtain, and even not exhibit him at all, if you say so. We are anxious to please our customers as nearly as we can; we are determined to study the tastes of those who patronize our establishment."

Remarks, practically like these, were made to a congregation in this city three weeks ago to-day, by a pastor who has just newly been called to fill the pulpit. He said: "Now you just let me know how you want this church run, and it shall be done just according to your instructions." He had an eye to business, and many of them are acquiring the same degree of shrewdness, and are so obliging as to try to please those who pay them. They will raise the Devil when the Devil is wanted, and make him down, when he is not desired. The whole truth lies just here: clergymen will preach up the Devil just so long as the people willingly accept him; and will throw him overboard, Jonah like, when he does not suit the popular demand. As it is money they work for, they feel it to be incumbent on them to answer the demands of that money; so when the people unitedly say: "We want no more Devil," we will have no more.

But what will Christianity do without a Devil and a hell? It will be worse than the play of "Hamlet," with the part of "Hamlet" omitted. This Devil, after all, cannot be given up, for the entire Christian theology is so blended and interwoven with him, that he cannot be dropped out, nor expurgated, without ruining the entire institution.

Can any loyal Christian doubt, for a moment, the existence of a Devil—a real, simon-pure, personal Beelzebub? Did not Jesus, Paul, Peter, John, Constantine, all the popes, prelates, bishops, fathers, priests, monks, friars, pastors, preachers, elders, and deacons, from the Master, down, believe in, and teach a live, walking, real Devil? Did not Luther, the father of Protestantism, believe in a Devil? In fact, did he not absolutely see him? We have his word that he did. The Devil appeared to him in his study, and the good saint threw his ink-stand at the Devil's head. Unfortunately he missed his mark, or, at all events, he did not kill, nor seriously injure his distinguished visitor. The great man was kind enough to commit to writing, and leave as a legacy to those who succeeded him, some of his experiences with the gentleman from below.

In his work on the abuses attendant on private masses, he says that he had conferences with the Devil on that subject, passing many bitter nights, and much restless and wearisome repose; that once in particular, Satan came to him in the dead of the night, when he was just awakened out of sleep. "The Devil," says Luther, "knows well enough, how to construct his arguments, and to urge them with the skill of a master. He delivers himself with a grave and yet shrill voice. Nor does he use circumlocutions and beat about the bush; but excels in forcible statements and quick rejoinders. I no longer wonder that the persons whom he assails in this way are occasionally found dead in their beds. He is able to compress and throttle, and more than once he has so assaulted me and driven my soul into a corner, that I felt as if the next moment it must leave my body. I am of the opinion that Gesner and Ecclampadius came in that manner to their deaths. The Devil's manner of opening a debate is pleasant enough, but he soon urges things so peremptorily that the respondent in a short time knows not how to acquit himself."

Here is positive testimony from the highest Christian source that there is a Devil, and that he is very sociable, argumentative and able in discussion. No Christian can doubt Luther's testimony on this very important subject.

We have also the positive testimony of Swedenborg and Blomberg that there is a Devil for they had seen him and conversed with him. Our own Joseph Smith, too, the Mormon Prophet, a man who could not be induced to make the slightest misrepresentation, avers that he not only saw the Devil, but had a personal conflict with him over those golden plates on which the Mormon Bible was engraved. The Devil was determined to get the plates away from the Prophet and he struggled hard to accomplish it, but for once, he found his match; Joseph was too much for the Archfiend, and he held on to the plates, compelling the Evil One to retire in disgrace.

There are plenty of others, divines and undivines, who positively assert that they have seen the Devil, and came in close contact with him. Yes, they not only saw him, but they smelt him, also. Some of the goatish smell was about him, but the odor of sulphur predominated. (It is asserted that he uses no cologne water nor "rosadora," to overcome his disagreeable smells.)

Notwithstanding the numbers who have seen him, there are several points as to his personality that are not clearly settled. There is some doubt about his complexion, the color of his eyes, the length of his horns, the dimensions of his tail, his avoirdupois, his exact height; whether he parts his hair in the middle; whether his clothes are in the latest fashion, whether it is his right or left foot that is cloven; whether on the other, he wears a boot or a gaiter; whether his coat is dress or sack; whether he regards Moody and Sunkey's style of snatching souls from his grasp, is the most effective that can be devised; whether he is in favor of a "third term," whether he believes Henry Ward Beecher knows anything about Elizabeth, and whether Henry is to be believed under oath.

It has been reported by some of these interviewers that the Devil is cross-eyed, in his off eye; but we have reason to think it an unmitigated slander, put into circulation by his enemies. We think if this had been the case, Martin Luther, who was a very observing man, would have discovered it and reported the same. It cannot easily be supposed that he could hold heated arguments and discussions with the Devil, wherein the major and minor propositions were duly presented; the premises laid down according to rule, and he not have discovered that his celebrated opponent was cross-eyed. The case is not presumable.

One of the saddest features in the whole history of the Devil, is his operations in the line of witchcraft. We will not say he is responsible for the great wrongs that have been committed in this direction; but as he was supposed to be the author and originator of all witchcraft, it is but proper we should consider it in connection with his character and existence.

The belief in witchcraft long existed in the world. As long ago as Moses penned the laws to govern the descendants of Abraham, he wrote very hard terms for those supposed to be witches. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," was one of his enactments, and this cruel, merciless sentence, for many centuries was accepted and acted upon as a decree from the throne of heaven, and many were put to death in that era, for being unfortunate enough to be judged a witch. It prevailed also in many heathen countries for hundreds of years, but it was reserved for Christianity to add the crowning touches of infamy and wrong, to this most unfortunate delusion, mania, or mental disease.

Witchcraft was held to be a supernatural power, which persons were supposed to obtain possession of, by entering into compact with the Devil. It was most frequently associated with the female character, and from that circumstance received its name.

The modern idea of witchcraft, denoting a regular league with the Evil One, dates from the rise of Christianity and obtained its higher development in the Middle Ages. At a later period, the Waldenses and other early seceders from the regular church, were accused and were cruelly and persistently persecuted for witchcraft. The highest dignitaries of the Church made no effort to check the madness that ran riot over Christian countries, but entered fully into the spirit of tormenting and putting to death, the unfortunate beings who were basely suspected of entering into compact with the Devil. Many thousands of pitiable wretches were whipped, and scourged, and drowned, and hung, and burnt, for the slightest suspicion of witchcraft being breathed against them. Many tests were devised for ascertaining whether a person was a witch, and had entered into a league with the Prince of Darkness. Water was often resorted to. They were thrown into the same; if they floated, they were hung as witches, and if they sank, they were innocent; but nevertheless were drowned; so it was death even to be suspected.

It is lamentable that dignified courts of justice lent themselves to this nefarious business, and aided in spreading this mental malaria. Sir Matthew Hale, one of England's ablest judges in former times, sat patiently, day after day, listening to the evidence adduced to prove that certain implicated parties were in secret compact with the Devil; and in passing sentence upon the hapless victims of ignorance and superstition, whom to be accused was, almost, to be put to death.

The persecutions and infamous cruelties extended toward the miserable females, who were chiefly suspected of the crime of being witches, and of entering into unholy compact with the Evil One, were exterminated and carried out in all Christian countries. In 1484 the head of the Christian Church, Pope Innocent, issued his famous bull, in which he narrated the prevailing superstitions on the subject, and appointed commissions to examine and punish witches. From that time it became a crime especially recognized by ecclesiastical authorities. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the persecutions of witches were actively carried on all over Europe, and an incredible number of unfortunate beings lost their lives.

Colange says: "The ideas that had come to be connected with the subject, are of a remarkable character. The witch was believed to have entered into a regular engagement with the Devil, who delivered her over to an imp or familiar spirit, to be always at her call, and to do whatever she desired of it; she, on the other hand, agreeing that she should be his after death. The witch was believed to possess the power to transport herself through the air upon a broom-stick—which was their favorite mode of travel—and of transforming herself into various forms of animal life, but more especially cats. As they are animals specially fond of slily roving around at all hours of the night, they were thought to be particularly adapted to the use of the witches. It was fully believed they possessed the power of inflicting disease upon any person whom they chose. Objects that were horrid and loathsome were regarded as chosen instruments of the witches, as dead bodies, toads, frogs, lizards, serpents, etc., etc.

A power was also assigned them over the elements, of raising storms or producing calms, and of casting malign influences over the fruits of the earth. The suspected persons were put to the most cruel tortures, in the agonies of which confessions were extorted from them which had little foundation in fact. Some confessions were, no doubt, voluntarily made, which were the result of imagination."

It is a black, bloody chapter of cruelty, oppression and wrong, which was for many centuries prosecuted in the name of religion and in behalf of a malicious Devil. It is said five thousand of these unfortunate victims of ignorance were burned at Geneva alone, and other parts of Europe, were not far behind. Voltaire states in his great work, "The Philosophical Dictionary," that over one hundred thousand witches were executed in the Christian States of Europe.

In the early settlement of this country, when the Puritanical stock brought with them from Europe the ignorant, superstitious and religious intolerance dominant there, they brought, also, the spirit of persecution and bitterness towards "witches." This cropped out early in certain localities, and raged with fiendish hate. Many a happy home was made desolate by it; many an innocent girl was wrongfully accused of being bewitched, and was cruelly subjected to the most abhorrent tests; many were incarcerated in loathsome prisons and kept there for the grave crime of being suspected of holding communication with the Devil. It was a busy time, indeed, for "witch-finders," and these were usually some sanctimonious, long-faced, nasal-twanged, praying, hypocritical church members, who constituted themselves into smelling committees, to look after the young girls and spinsters, as well as old women in their neighborhood—for these were the ones supposed to be liable to enter into compact with the gentleman below. Hundreds of these innocent and interesting persons, against whom the merest breath of suspicion was whispered, were remorselessly dragged from their homes and friends, and at all hours of the day and night, and imprisoned for weeks amid the greatest discomforts and disgrace; and after formal trials of great solemnity before learned judges, and the first Christians in the country, but upon the most trivial and ex parte testimony, were found guilty, and condemned to death; yes, considerable numbers of these unhappy victims of ignorance, religious superstition, zeal and intolerance were positively executed, and this less than two centuries ago, and in our glorious old State of Massachusetts.

But, thanks to dawning reason and increasing common sense, this terrible business was soon checked; trials and executions of witches were suppressed, and the evils that had been supposed to be witchcraft, soon terminated; and, except among persons of limited intelligence and reason, there has been but little belief in witches and witchcraft since. With the faith in sorcerers and sorcery, which for many centuries pervaded and cursed many countries and peoples—a belief that sorcerers were in close communion with the Devil, and by his power foretold future events, revealed hidden secrets, discovered stolen property and did many other impossible things—fortunately for the happiness of the human race, has passed away.

Witchcraft, truly, had a long, cruel and bloody history, which it is not our present purpose to sketch, but with a blush of shame for our race, we have to confess that this gigantic, almost incomparable wrong for centuries and millenniums even, was fostered and prosecuted in the name of a personal Devil! It is one of the sad, saddest blots on the page of history, which we would gladly erase, were it in our power.

Now, from what we have here uttered, about that supposed, ever-vigilant enemy of the human race, some of you may have a curiosity to know if we believe in the existence of a Devil. With all due solemnity, and with the highest regard for truth, we are compelled to confess that we do. We believe in an absolute, over-ruling Devil which has long, long cursed the world and our most unfortunate race. The name of this Devil is, IGNORANCE. He is not only a positive, real Devil, but he is the author of all the other devils that have ever existed in the imagination of man; and beside him there is none other. But thanks to the powers that be, there are forces superior to him, and all of us, yes, all mankind who have been cursed, with the machinations of this powerful devil may easily learn to subdue him, and to gain absolute power over him. These forces are KNOWLEDGE, SCIENCE, INTELLIGENCE—the true Saviors of the world.

With the supremacy of these potent forces, no Devil can longer exist; but with the imps, the demons, the sprites, the gnomes, the satyrs, the genii, the furies, the gorgons, the harpies, the bogies, the goblins, the dragons, all the monstrosities, as well as the witches, the fairies, the nymphs, the naiads, the undines, and all the gods, which, for thousands of years have existed, only, in the imagination of man, are fast passing off the stage. They were all equally inventions and creations of man, devised and believed in, when ignorance reigned supreme. As this power is dispelled by the forces just named, these will all take their final departure for the land of oblivion, to annoy, afflict and curse our race no more forever.

But is there no Evil in existence? Is everything good and lovely? Is there no wrong? There surely is wrong; there are evils; but they are not personages nor beings, any more than death, sin, life, truth, hope, charity, love, and many other similar qualities, which in poetry and figurative language have often been personified. None of these are personalities, none have a local, circumscribed existence. They are principles, and have a universal existence.

What, then, is Evil? It is, in three words, a mis-application of good. Good and evil are relative terms. There is nothing in existence but what is either, good or evil, according to the use that is made of it. Everything of which we know, or can conceive, is good if properly used, and it may also be evil if not so used. Take fire, for instance, in cold weather, as at this season of the year, in warming our dwellings, in dispelling the cold, and in cooking our food, it is a great and indispensable good; but when misapplied, it becomes a most gigantic evil, which Chicago, Boston and thousands of other localities can fully understand.

The same with water. In the composition of our bodies and the bodies of all animal and vegetable life, for quenching thirst, for driving our mills and factories, for floating our ships and steamboats, for a highway between continents and nations, it is a great, an incalculable, an indispensable good; but when it comes in deluging rains and devastating floods, it is an evil of immense magnitude, which the people of France, our own country and nearly all countries, this year, and many others, can easily appreciate.

The same with the wind. When gentle, in the zephyr and in the breeze, enlivening and purifying the atmosphere and removing the effects of stagnation and malaria, and in driving our sailing vessels, it is a great good; but when it comes in the form of the gale, the hurricane, the whirlwind and the cyclone, it is an immense evil.

The same with all kinds of food; if used at proper time and in proper quantities they are good, but if used in excess they are all capable of becoming great evils. Most substances that are good, when taken into the mouth, if inserted in the eyes or ears are positive evils. So we see that everything is either good or evil, just according to the use that is made of it, and no being or person of man's imagining is necessary to represent either.

Man is an intricate organization, possessing many functions of heart, lungs, stomach, brain and other parts of the body. He has in his mental organization noble sentiments, elevated incentives, comprehensive judgment and a masterly intellect; and he also possesses lower propensities and passions. These are all good in their legitimate places and in proper proportions. Every passion subserves a good purpose when in its appropriate use, and when not mis-applied or in-indulged in excess. The evil with these qualities exists not in themselves, but in the use and application that is made of them. There are no persons so good, but what they have some imperfections, and none so bad, nor disproportionately organized, but what they possess some good.

It should be the labor of our lives to inform ourselves of the uses and abuses of everything that exists, and to learn to make a proper use of all we come in contact with. If the best use we can make of some things, is to avoid them and let them entirely alone, so be it.

These qualities, called good and bad, are like the plants which grow out of the earth; all are good for some purpose, but some possess more good than others. It should be our study and our purpose to cultivate the good and uproot the hurtful. We should remove the weeds, the thistles, nettles, briars and thorns which occupy the ground and contribute but little to our happiness, and encourage and give careful culture to the wheat, the corn, the esculent roots, the fruits, the flowers, and every plant that ministers to our needs and adds to our happiness.

Let us do this in the mental, as well as in the material domain, and we will need to have but a small amount of evil in our world, and will surely have no use for a big, ugly, insinuating, tormenting, vindictive, personal Devil. When this good day comes, may we not hope the tens of thousands of public teachers and preachers who now spend their talents and their lives in promulgating ancient crudities, superstitions, falsities, fables and myths, which, as we have seen, had their origin in ignorance, will decide to instruct the people only in the grand, the beautiful, the elevating, the refining, the happyifying and the true? When science and reason will be our guiding stars, and the myths and the devils of the primitive ages, will hide themselves in the shades of forgetfulness.

It is possible some of the expressions and some of the arguments we have used, may to some seem harsh and uncharitable. Far be it from us to hurt "the oil and the wine" in the heart of any individual, or to speak disrespectfully of the good that exists in any system of religion, or in any form of belief. We are free to confess, Christianity with all its excesses, with all its faults, and with all its errors, has contained and enjoined much that is good, and that great numbers of those who have embraced it, have been sincere, honest-hearted, well-disposed men and women; but who have been misled in supposing the system to be heaven-born, God-given, and angel-nurtured, when it is only made up of the dogmas, fables and mythologies of heathen nations, which existed thousands of years before Christianity came upon the stage; and all of which dogmas, as we have seen, were the figments and imaginations of the human brain.

It is now fully demonstrated that the human race came from a low origin, on a level with the animal plane, and has, with obstructions and drawbacks, gradually progressed, until it has arrived where it is to-day; and that it did not start high up, at a point of perfection, and since been constantly deteriorating and getting worse and worse.

All systems of religious belief which the world has contained, have possessed some good, and the adherents of all have doubtless, been sincere and aimed to discharge their duty and to accomplish commendable results. Every system has been more good, more commendable than it might have been, had it been worse. All could have been worse—more pernicious. But not a system of religion the world has yet believed in, has been free from errors; not one that has been true. All were based upon mistaken notions of gods and devils; all originated in fallacies and absurdities, or which were copied and adopted by one system from another.

We see the same general characteristics common to all the numerous systems that have preceded us. All have had their gods which they worshipped; all have had their devils which they feared. Christianity originated none of this, nor a single dogma she holds to-day. This truth might as well be plainly stated and plainly understood as to longer evade the issue. It must be met sooner or later, and there can be nothing gained by longer deferring it. Let us manfully face the music at once. It is a borrowed system—a part from Judaism, and a part from paganism, but all false together.

The foundations of it are not laid in truth. We now know the Universe was not started six thousand years ago, and that the earth is not the centre of it; that the sun and moon do not revolve around it, and that the stars are not small brilliant objects set in a firmament or circumscribed arch, near the earth, and for "signs and seasons;" we know that Adam and Eve could not have been the first human pair that existed, but that human beings have lived on the earth at least forty thousand years. Similarly we know that all the cardinal doctrines of Christianity are unfounded in truth. We have seen how the crude idea of devils and gods first took position in the infantile human mind, and how they evolved and developed from age to age; and on taking a correct view of these old beliefs, we see that to suppose any of those dogmas or opinions were given from a god is wholly without foundation.

We are not one of those who think all these various systems of religion, have been continuous links in the great chain of evolution, and that they all must needs be, like a wheel in an intricate machine, which could not be spared without immense damage to the entire structure. If there has been a gradual progression from one to another, (and this has not always been apparent, for there has been retrogression;) there has not been a single system of faith which could not easily have been spared from the world without serious inconvenience; and Christianity is no exception.

It is difficult to understand how the belief in any form of error can be of great utility to the race, or how the floundering of mankind, for thousands of years in the fogs, and mists and darkness of superstition and delusion, was the greatest good the race could have under the circumstances. It is the nature of error—however firmly planted in sincerity—to hamper, clog and fetter its adherents, and we cannot understand how it can, under any circumstances, be the greatest good the race could enjoy. Truth is better than error; reality than imagination.

How great soever the results arising for any of the antique religions of the past may be supposed, by many, to have been, and how so ever closely they may be thought to have been connected in the great work of evolution through which the race has passed, one thing is morally certain, they are no longer adapted to the wants and needs of the present. The world has outgrown all the imperfect and fabulous theories and doctrines of olden time, and is reaching out for something better, something higher, something truer. Wise is he, who is prepared and willing to step forward with the advance guard, and help to "ring out the old and ring in the new."

The religious creeds of the world have doubtless held it back in the regions of darkness and imperfection for thousands of years; and they have not been the benefit to mankind which many imagine. The advance of the race would have been much more rapid, could truth always have been the guiding star, and not falsehood. It is, however, useless to mourn over the mistakes of the past; "Let bygones be bygones." Our duty and our labor to-day is, to come to the truth, direct, and to rid ourselves of the mistakes of the past with all possible and practicable speed, cultivating, under all circumstances, a spirit of fraternity and a desire to add as much to the welfare and happiness of humanity, as in our power.

We have reason to rejoice that the progress the world has made is as great as it is, considering the impediments and difficulties it has had to encounter; and the great mass of ignorance, superstition and wrong it has had to meet and contend with. Light is breaking in; the myths of olden times are, one after another giving way, and in due time, if we steadily pursue our course, and keep our faces toward the goal of truth, the full effulgence of the genial sun of Reason, Science and Devotion to Humanity will ultimately illumine our pathway.

In closing, we will quote two more extracts, which seem appropriate to the line of thought we have been pursuing. The first is from our own revered Prof. Draper, than whom, in the humble opinion of your speaker, there is hardly a greater living man, and one who has done more excellent service in the cause of truth. We quote from his incomparable work, "The Intellectual Development of Europe" (p. 412):

"All these delusions, which occupied the minds of our forefathers, and from which not even the powerful and learned were free, have totally passed away. The moonlight has now no fairies; the solitude no genii; the darkness no ghost, no goblin. There is no necromancer who can raise the dead from their graves—no one who has sold his soul to the Devil and signed the contract with his blood—no angry apparition to rebuke the crone who has disquieted him. Divination, agromancy, pyromancy, hydromancy, cheiromancy, augury, interpreting of dreams, oracles, sorcery, astrology, have all gone. It is three hundred and fifty years since the last sepulchral lamp was found, and that was at Rome. There are no gorgons, hydras, chimeras; no familiars; no incubus or succubus. The housewives of Holland no longer bring forth sootierkins by sitting over lighted chafers. No longer do captains buy of Lapland witches, favorable winds; no longer do our churches resound with prayers against the baleful influences of comets, though there still linger in some of our noble old rituals, forms of supplication for dry weather and rain; useless, but not unpleasing reminiscences of the past. These delusions have vanished with the night to which they appertained, yet they were the delusions of fifteen hundred years."

The second extract is from the pen of the equally meritorious Prof. Wm. Denton.

Sigh, priests;—cry aloud—hang your pulpits with black.

Let sorrow bow down every head;

The good friend who bore all your sins on his back,

Your best friend, the Devil, is dead.

Your church is a corpse—you are guarding its tomb;

The soul of your system has fled;

The death knell is tolling your terrible doom;

It tells us, the Devil is dead.

You're bid to the funeral, ministers all,
We've dug the old gentleman's bed;
Your black coats will make a most excellent pall,

To cover your friend who is dead.

Aye, lower him mournfully into the grave;

Let showers of tear-drops be shed;

Your business is gone:—there are no souls to save;

Their tempter, the Devil, is dead.

Woe comes upon woe; it is dreadful to think.

Hell's gone and the demons have fled;

The damn'd souls have broken their chains, every link.

The jailor, who bound them, is dead.

Camp-meetings henceforth will be needed no more:

Revivals are knocked on the head;

The orthodox vessel lies stranded on shore;

Their captain, the Devil, is dead.

A DOCTOR went out West to practice his profession. An old friend met him on the street one day and asked him how he was succeeding in his business. "First rate," he replied. "I've had one case." "Well, and what was that?" "It was a birth," said the doctor. "How did you succeed with that?" "Well, the old woman died, and the child died. But I think I'll save the old man yet!"

A LITTLE GIRL lately reproved for playing out-doors with boys, and informed that, being seven years old, she "was too big for that now," replied with all imaginable innocence, "Why, grandma, the bigger we grow, the better we like 'em." Grandma took time to think.

NOT AFRAID OF THE DEVIL.—A colored man named Nelson is owing a butcher on Beaubien street five or six dollars, and after trying in vain to collect the money, the butcher and a friend put their heads together the other night and laid a plan. About midnight they called at Nelson's house, and he was awakened by a rap on the window.

"Who's dar?" he called out.

"The Devil!" solemnly replied the butcher.

"You is, hey?"

"Yes. I want you!"

"What fur?"

"You refuse to pay your butcher, and I am sent to take you to the bottomless pit!"

"You is?"

"I am! Come forth at once!"

"Ize comin'!" replied the negro as he jumped out of bed; "I can't pay dat six dollars half as easy in any odder way, an' de old woman is so mighty cross Ize glad to get away from home."

The butcher and his friend didn't wait for Mr. Nelson to come out.—Detroit Free Press.
